1483. the least Nine Months after the Death of their Father, and six Months after King Richard; which will import thus much, That if King Richard then, lawfully and quietly possess'd of the Crown, suffer'd them to live so long, there is no reason why he shou'd after make them away, for their Lives cou'd not rectify their Blood or Titles, nor their Deaths advantage him; neither can Bastards be dangerous or prejudicial to the True and Titular Lord, or Lawful Proprietary, be he Prince or Subject; witness Foreign Countries, and England it self, which holds Bastards incapable of Heritage, Honour or Offices. In the Month of February, towards the end of this Parliament, the King in his Providence to establish the Regal Fortune and Succession in the Prince his Son, and to fasten the Affection of the Nobility and the People unto him with the Crown, procures them to meet him in the Palace at Westminster, and there (Interiori Conaculo, as mine Author saith) tendred by the Duke of Norfolk unto them, an Oath of Fealty and Allegiance in writing, to be taken to the Prince of Wales; which they took and subscrib'd most willingly: The Occasion of this, was his Jealousy of that New League struck up between the Earl of Richmond and the Duke of Buckingham, who was now discover'd more apparently, and the rest of the Engagement. To oppose and suppress them therefore, and stifle the Confederacy before it should grow more threatening; the King makes a Commission by Letters Patents, in the Name of the Vice-Constable of England, unto Sir Ralph Ashton; a Copy whereof (the President being unusual, and the Office great) I have transcrib'd verbatim from the Records in the Chapel of the * Converts.

To the Vice-Constable of England Constituted.

1483. THE King to his beloved and faithful Ralph Ashton Kt. greeting. Know, that We fully confiding in your Fidelity, Wisdom, and Integrity, have assign'd, deputed, and ordain'd you at this time our Vice-Constable of England, and our Commissioner, Giving and Committing to you by the tenor of these Presents, Power and Authority general, and our special Command to Hear, Examine and Proceed against all Persons whatsoever, suspected or guilty of the Crime of High-Treason against Us, either by way of Examination of Witnesses, or otherways, as shall seem to you most expedient and suitable to your Office: As also in these Causes, judicially and sententially, according to the Exigency of the Case and Demerit of the Delinquent, without all Noise or Appeal, when you shall think fit, to Proceed, Determine and Commit to Final Execution, with all Clauses, Words, and special Terms by Law or Custom required to the Execution of that Our Command and Authority, as if here particularly express'd; taking unto your Assistance some Publick Notary of known Fidelity, who may commit to Writing all these things, with what else shall in or about the Premises seem necessary, or any manner of way requisite; Commanding and strictly Injoining you, That all other Affairs whatever being laid aside, you apply your selves to the foresaid, how often, and at what time it shall be necessary; and that the above-named Causes you Hear, Examine, and in the same Proceed and them Determine and commit to final Execution as said is. We also by the tenor of these Presents strictly command all and every one in this Part whom it may concern, to obey you in performing the Premises, and that they assist and diligently help you in all Things, In Confirmation, &c. Witness the King at Covent. the 24th Day of October, and First Year of his Reign; Taken from the Mouth of the King himself.

What Success this Commission, and new Office had, I find not reported; but it might come too late, or the new Officer forget what he was to execute, for the Faction lost none they could Corrupt or Win; yet surely, the Institution of it was very Politick and Important, as a plain Image and Pourtrait of the Office and Authority of the Great or High Constable of England, which, in the Execution of a Wise and Valiant Person, is of a high and great use.

Having made mention of these Offices, it shall not be a Parergue, between these Acts, to inter-add the rest of this King's Officers, both Chief and Others; at the least, such as were of Honour or Dignity: I have before named the High-Constable, the Great Marshal, High Admiral, Lord Chamberlain, the rest were Sir John Wood the Elder, Lord Treasurer the First Year, and Sir John Touchet, Lord Audley during the rest of his Reign: Dr. Russel Bishop of Lincoln had the Great Seal, Thomas Barrow was Master of the Rolls, (which Place Henry the Seventh continued to him, and made him a Privy Counsellor) John Kendal was Principal Secretary, Sir William Hopson Treasurer of the Other Officers of K. Richard 3.

Household,

1483. Household, Sir Thomas Peirce Controulor, after him Sir John Buck, John Gunthorp Keeper of the Privy Seal, Sir William Hussey Chief Justice, Thomas Tremaine and Roger Townsend the King's Serjeants, Morgan Kidwel Attorney General, Nicholas Fitz-William Recorder of London.

Treaties and Foreign Princes, I have seen a Memorial of for League one for Intercourse and Commerce, between and Commerce him and (m) Philip Duke of Burgundy, and the with Flanders, who in the Record are call'd In the Memoirs of Flanders: These Princes and States had Determin the Affairs, which I find they dispatch'd with Approbation of the Princes their Masters.

In Rolls There was also a Commission about these Anno 1 R. 3. Times, to Hear and Redress the Complaints made to the King, by the Subjects of the King of France and of Denmark, which was well expedited.

1484. Anno Regni 2. That Treaty of Peace and League with Scotland, (began before) was continued, and finish'd by Commissioners sent from James IV. King of Scotland, and by other Commissioners Delegate for the King of England; those for Scotland were Coli Earl of Argyle, Chancellor of Scotland, N. Bishop of Aberdeen, the Ld. Lisle, the Lord Dromonde of Stobhall, Mr. Archibald Qubittlaw, Archdeacon of Lodion and Secretary to the King, Lion King at Arms, and Duncan of Dundas; they came to Nottingham in September, Anno Dom. 1484, and were honourably receiv'd in the Great Chamber of the Castle, the King sitting under his Royal Cloth of State; Mr. Archibald Qubittlaw, stepping before the rest, address'd a very Eloquent Oration unto him in Latin, which reflected upon the Praise of Martial Men and Art Military, including much to the Honour and Praise of King Richard. This Treaty aim'd partly at a Truce and Peace, partly at a Marriage between James the Prince of Scotland and the Lady Anne, Daughter of John de la Poole, Duke of Suffolk, and Niece to King Richard.

Commissioners for the King of England, were John Bishop of Lincoln, Richard Bishop of St. Asaph, John Duke of Norfolk, Henry Earl of Northumberland, Mr. John Gunthorp Custos privati Signilli, Sir Thomas Stanley, Lord Stanley, Sir N. Ld. Strange, Sir N. Lord Powis, Sir Henry Lord Fitzburgh, Sir Humphry Lord Dacres, Mr. Thomas Barrow Master of the Rolls, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, William Catesby, and Richard Salkeld: The other for the Treaty of Alliance and Marriage, were Thomas Archbishop of York, John Bishop of Lincoln, John Bishop of Worcester, John Duke of Norfolk, William Earl of Nottingham, John Sutton, Lord Dudley, N. Lord Scroope of Upsal, Sir William Hussey, Chief Justice of the King's Bench; Sir Richard Ratcliffe, and William Catesby: But the Success of that, and many other Good Intentments, were interposed by the Inconstancy and Contraste of the Times. The Lady Anne de la Poole, upon the breach thereof, (resolving to accept no other Motion) forthwith took a Religious Habit in the Monastery of Sion (n).

There was another Treaty of Peace and Truce in this Second Year, between him and the Duke of Brittain, or at the least given out for Peace, yet was indeed but a Part and Pretext of the Treaty: For the main Negotiations on the King's side, was, how to get the Earl of Richmond out of his Custody into his own, or be as well secur'd of him there as his Brother King Edward was: And for this Treaty, the chief Negotiators were the Bishop of Lincoln, and Sir Thomas Hutton for the King, the Bishop of Leon and others for the Duke. The Treaty began Anno Dom. 1484. and was finish'd and ratified in the Year following; but the Duke violated his Part immediately, by giving Aid to the King's Enemies.

In the same Year there were Letters made (which are yet extant in the Treasury of the Exchequer) that moved a Peace and Truce between King Richard and Charles VIII. King of France; wherein it must be understood, the Tribute before mention'd was Articled.

Also in this Year, and the Year before, there was a private Treaty, which we must not pass by, for the Marriage of the Lady Elizabeth with King Richard himself: What the Success of it was, and how far it proceeded, will more aptly present it self in another place.

We are now to take notice of the Duke of Buckingham's Revolt, for this was the Preparative and Fourrier of the rest: And to give it the more taking Feature and specious Pretence, it must be given out, That the Cause was the Reformation of an Ill Government and Tyranny, under which Species (for Treason is ever fairly palliated, and seldom wants the form of some Plea, tho' at the Bar) they must take up Arms against the King. And here (as some Rivers deriv'd from the Sea, cannot suddenly lose their taste of saltness) they discover'd their ancient Taint and Inconstancy, which the Prince wisely suspected from the first. For the Duke of Buckingham (how Affably soever he trim'd his Countenance) it shoud seem departed Malecontent from Court, yet made not that general publick pretended Cause of the King's Crimes all his Quarrel, but challeng'd him by some private Grudges, * as denying to give or restore to him the Earldom of Hereford and Constableship of England

Revolt of the Duke of Buck.

The Duke of Buck. first riseth in Rebellion. The Quarrel of the Duke of Buckingham against the King.

(m) This cannot be true, for Philip D. of Burgundy died in June 1467. according to Comines, and his Son, Charles Ten Years after him. To Charles succeeded Anne his Daughter, married to Maximilian Arch-Duke of Austria, who in right of his Wife was stiled Duke of Burgundy till the Year 1485, when he was chosen King of the Romans, and 'twas 1492. before his Son the Arch-Duke Philip succeeded him in the Sovereignty of the Netherlands, as Duke of Burgundy, Eight Years after King Richard's Death. — Phil. de Com.

(n) Thin, in his Account of all the Dukes in England since the Conquest, says Anne de la Poole was by King Richard's procurement, married to the Duke of Rothsay, the Scots King's eldest Son. — Hol. p. 1236.

* King Richard had extremely obliged this Duke, to keep him fast to him; so that he had little reason to be malecontent. While he was Duke of Gloucester and Protector of the Realm, and of the Person of his Nephew Edward V. he procured for the Duke almost all the Government and Authority of Wales, and other bordering Counties: For he had the Office of Constable of all the King's Castles, and the Office of Steward of the said Castles and divers Manours, Royalties, Lands, Lordships, &c. in the Counties of Salop, Hereford, Somerset, Dorset and Wilts: To have without making Account or rendering any thing to the King. To him also Edward V. granted the whole Oversight and Government of his Subjects in those Counties, and a Power and Authority for the security of his Person and Kingdom, and Conservation of Peace in those Parts, to call them together, and to Array and Arm them. To the said Duke the King also gave the Office of Chief Justice and Chamberlain in South and North Wales for term of Life. He constituted him Constable of the Castle and County of Carmarthen, of the Castle and County of Cardigan, of the Castle of Aberystwith in Cardigan, the Castle of Denevey in South Wales, the Castle and Town of Tynbych in the County of Pembroke, the Castle and Lordship of Kilgarrum in South Wales, and the Castle and Town of Llanstephan there; the Lordship of Wallwyns Castle in the County of Pembroke: the Castle and Lordship of West-Haverford in South Wales. He also gave, granted and constituted

stituted the said Duke to be Constable, Steward and Receiver of the Castle, Lordship and Manour of Usk, the Castle and Manour of Carlion, the Castle, Lordship and Manour of Dynos; the Castle and half of the Lordship and Manour of Emyas Laz; the Castle Lordship and Manour of Belth; and the Castles, Manours and Lordships of Clifford, of Ragener, of Melenueh, of Montgomery, of Dynbigh, of Elbel, of Nerberch, of Wigmore, of Holt, of Bransfeld, with a great number more in Wales and the Marches of Wales, which were in the Hands and Possession of the Earl of Pembroke before.

Again by another Patent, the King constituted the said Henry Duke of Bucks, Constable, Steward and Receiver of the Castle, Manour and Town of Monmouth; and all Castles, Towns, Lordships, Manours, Lands, Tenements, which were parcel of the Duchy of Lancaster in South Wales. He was also constituted Keeper or Chief Forester of the Forest and Chase of Hodenake, with all the Profits, Commodities, &c. And to put in all manner of Officers, Bailiffs, &c. Still further there was another Grant to him from Edward of Gomerlands in Wales, and to have the Rule, Government and Oversight of them and the present Officers turn'd out to admit the Duke.

Besides all these large Grants from Edm. V. Richard when he came to reign added, most royally, further Favours to him; for he had made him, First of all Great Chamberlain of England, June 28. afterwards he made him Steward of the Honour of Tutbury, in the County of Derby and Stafford; also of the Castle, Town and Lordship and Manour of Newcastle under Tyne; the Lordships and Manours of Worswerth and Asbourn, and all the Castles, Lordships and Manours, &c. in the same County, parcel of the Duchy of Lancaster: Also the Office of Constable of the Castle of Tutbury, Master Forester of the Chase of Nedewood and of Duffeld Firib; and the same Duke to be Supervisor of the Honour aforesaid, and of the same Castles, Manours, Lordships, Towns, Lands and Tenements, Forests, Chaces, Parks and Warrens in the County aforesaid, with the Appurtenances, parcel of the said Duchy: Also Master of the Game of the same Forests, Chaces, Parks and Warrens aforesaid; also Chief and Great Steward of the Honours aforesaid, and other Premises, for the term of the said Duke's Life, with the Fees, &c. anciently due and accustomed thereto; and an 100 l. of lawful Money for the term of his Life, out of the Revenues aforesaid, by the Hand of the Receiver. Also, the Office of the Steward of the Lordship of the High Peak, and to be Master of the Forest, and Surveyor of the Forest there. And also to be Constable of the Castle of Donington in the County of Leicester, and Steward of the same Castle, Lordship and Manour, parcel of the said Honour of Tutbury. And also to have Power and Authority, during his Life, to make from time to time, all Bailiffs, Foresters, Parkers and other Officers and Ministers.

To the same Duke, K. Richard granted also the Office of Constable of all the Castles, and of Steward of all the Castles, Lordships, Manours, Lands, &c. in the Counties of Salop and Hereford, which were then vacant, and which hereafter should be vacant; and also the Supervisorthip of all the King's Subjects there.

To the same Duke was also a Grant by Letters Patents to be Constable, Steward and Receiver of the Castle, Manour and Town of Uske in the March of Wales; and of all other Castles, Lordships, Manours, Towns, Lands, &c. which were Parcels of the Earldom of March in North Wales, South Wales, and March of Wales: And also to be Keeper or Chief Forester of the Forest and Chase of Tremeke, and all other Forests and Chaces, parcel of the Earldom aforesaid in North Wales, South Wales, and March of Wales, for term of Life. And again, to the same Duke, the Office of Chief Justice and Chamberlain in South and North Wales, for term of Life; giving further Power and Authority to make, exercise and execute all and singular things belonging to those Offices.

Further, by another Patent K. Richard granted to Henry D. of Bucks, the Offices of Constable, Steward and Receiver of the Castle, Manours and Towns of Monmouth and Kidwelly in South Wales; and of all other Castles, Lordships, Towns in North and South Wales, and Marches of Wales, Parcel of the Duchy of Lancaster; and the Office of Master Forester and Master of the Game within all the Forests, &c.

And lastly, he had granted him the Stewardship of the Town of Chesterfield; and of the Manour and Lordship of Scarsdale in the County of Derby, for term of Life. J. S. Journ. of K. Rich. III.

The Title of the Earldom of Hereford, and Constableship of England.

England (for they went together a long time) which he alledg'd belong'd to the Partage that fell to his Great Grand-mother the Lady Anne Daughter and Heir of Thomas Plantagenet, alias Woodstock, created by King Richard II. Duke of Gloucester and Earl of Buckingham, and of his Wife Elienor, Daughter and Co-heir of Humphry de Bobun Earl of Hereford and Constable of England: Which Claim, had he considerately look'd upon, could not rightly revolve to him, but rather was for the King's Part; for Humphry de Bobun Earl of Hereford, of Essex and Northampton, Lord of Brecknock and Constable of England (in the time of King Edward III. and the last Earl of the Family of the Bobuns) had by the Lady Jane his Wife, Daughter of Richard Fitz-Allan Earl of Arundel, two Daughters and Heirs Elienor and Mary: Elienor was married to the same Thomas Plantagenet, alias de Woodstock, youngest Son of King Edward the Third, Duke of Gloucester and Earl of Buckingham; Mary, the second Daughter, was married to Henry Plantagenet Duke of Lancaster, and after King of England, by the Name of Henry the Fourth, and the Earldom of Hereford fell to his Wife; in favour whereof, he was created D. of Hereford by K. Rich. II. and the Earldom (now a Duchy) and the Rights thereof remain'd in the King, and in the King's Heirs and Successors until the Death of K. Hen. VI. who died without Issue, and then all the Estate of Lancaster (especially that of the Royal Family of Lancaster) escheated to King Edward IV. and from him it came to King Richard, as Heir to his Brother and all his Ancestors. But the D. of Buckingham pretended Title to that Earldom by his said Grandmother Anne, who was one of the Daughters and Heirs of the aforesaid Lady Elienor (Wife of Thomas de Woodstock Duke of Gloucester) and the Wife of Edmond Stafford Earl of Stafford, and Grandfather to this Henry Duke of Buckingham, who the rather presum'd to make this Claim, because the Issue of the other Sister Mary being extinct, he took himself also to be her Heir.

But King Richard relishing something in this, near the Disposition and Inclination of Bullingbrook, answer'd, "That the Earldom of Hereford was of the Inheritance of Henry IV. who was also King of England (tho' by Tort and Usurpation) and will you, my Lord of Buckingham, claim to be Heir of Henry the Fourth? You may then haply assume his Spirits, and lay claim to the Crown by the same Titles.

This was as bitter as short, and doubly ill taken; First, because it came with a Repulse: Next, because it seem'd to proceed from a Suspicion, and as a tax of his Loyalty, and begets another pretence of Exception in the Duke's Bosom, which he call'd a breach of Promise in the King, for not joyning the Prince his Son in Marriage with the Lady Anne Stafford his Daughter: But all those Colours were but to give Complexion to the Face of his Defection; the true Cause was well divined and found out by the King, his Ambition and Aim to be Sovereign, rais'd by an overweening of that Royal Blood he supposed to be in his Descent from the said Thomas de Woodstock, &c. Son of a King; and yet he was not resolutely determin'd to make his Claim to the Crown this way, nor to attempt the Kingdom by Arms, until those Embers which (as it were) lay but luke-warm in his Thoughts, were quicken'd and reviv'd by the Animation of Dr. Morton Bishop of Ely, then a Privy Counsellor, tho' he stood in some Umbrage and Disgrace in the Court with the King, for his Practices against him, and was at this time in the Custody of the Duke of Buckingham as a Prisoner; (n) more expressly, for that being a Privy Counsellor, he had given secret Advertisment to the Earl of Richmond of what pass'd in the secret Counsels of the King; to this Advantage

1483. vantage he applies that which he had wittily drawn from the Duke's Discontent and Passionate Discourses at times past. By which, perceiving the Glance of his Ambition, and that deriv'd from the great Opinion of his Royal Blood, he pregnantly tickles and feeds that Humour, until he had sooth'd him past his own Strength or Retirement; for his secret Drift was, to apt and prepare the Duke to a Rebellion at any hand, tho' not to set his own Title on foot, yet lays open the Advantage of the present times to it, proposing flat Usurpation and Tyranny against the King Regnant, and the strong likelihood of his Deposing. This lifts the Duke something higher in his own Opinion. But coming to Paule, and perceiving Richmond was the Man they had aim'd at for this Great Blow (who had condition'd by Oath to marry the Lady Elizabeth, (for the Countess of Richmond, had by the Means of Dr. Lewis, conciliated the Friendship of the Queen Mother to that Alliance, and to draw as many of the House of York into the Action as were at her Devotion) that many Potent Lords and some Foreign Princes had promised their Aids.) He began to retreat, and conceive he had taken the wrong Path to his Journey's end, for his Title and Claim must be nothing, if those of York and Lancaster were united: And that the Earl (who stood between him and his Aims) was not only resolute to attempt, but strongly aided for it, himself not able, upon such an Instant, to raise a Power able to Encounter, much less give Check unto his violent Ambition, therefore concludes all against himself, and that it would fall out far better to side with the Times; a Consideration which doubtless would highly stir a Spirit where so much Greatness of Opinion and Ambition was. And the Doctor discerning this Disgust, and that he was startled in his Hope and Resolution, to recover him an entire Man, and not let him stand by an idle Spectator in so meritorious an Action, he opens a private way of Honour and Satisfaction, suggesting him the first and greatest Man the Kingdom was to know next the King: And finding his particular Distastes to King Richard, of quickest Sense and Argument to him, he freshly urges (and as it were) refrigates each Particle, to the greatness of his Spirit and Discontent. The Duke replies not much at that time, but 1483. busy in his Thoughts leaves him, and presently fashions a Visit to the Countess of Richmond, (a Lady of a politick and contriving Bosom) to know the credit of his Intelligence, which she insinuates, with Arguments so full of Circumstance and Honour, besides her Son's Indearment to him, their nearness of Blood, affirming the Duke's Mother a Somerfet, the reciprocal Affinity between her Father and his, and then the Bravery and Religion in the Cause that the Duke now forsakes himself, and fully gives up his Resolution and Promise to her: Thus prepar'd he finds out the Lord Stanley, the Marquess of Dorset, Edward Courtney Earl of Devonshire, and his Brother the Bishop of Exeter, Sir John Bourchier, Sir John Wells, Robert Willoughby, Edward Woodvil, Thomas Arundel, who had severally rais'd Forces, and intended their Rendezvous near Gloucester, so to march for Dorsetshire, there to receive the Earl and the Duke with his Welshmen: But the King was early in his Preparation, to prevent them before they could unite, or the Earl of Richmond arrive there, else they had fastned a most dangerous Blow upon him*. And at this full stop, in these Progresses, methinks, we may observe, how uncertainly in our strongest Valuations we are our own; and that our greatest Confidences and humane Policies, are but heavy Weights hung at trembling Wires, while our Expectations are apt to be flatter'd and outgo themselves, but are overtaken in their Success and Fates, as was this Great Man's; for their Forces neither met by Sea nor Land, the English being scatter'd by a sudden and huge Inundation that so dangerously overflow'd all Passages, they cou'd not joyn nor pass the River Severne, while the suddenness and strangeness of it struck the Souldiers with such Alteration, that most part of them forsook the Duke and left him to himself: The Earl of Richmond was as unfortunately met at Sea by a great Tempest, upon the Coasts of England.

The King took the Advantage this Accident offer'd, and pursu'd the Duke, not only with a Galloping Army, but with Edicts and Prescriptions that promised a Thousand Pounds in Money (whereunto some Writers add, so much Lands as was worth One Hundred Pounds per Ann.) to any one that should bring in the Duke, who was betray'd and brought to the King, then at Salisbury, by || Humphry Banister, of an eternal

* The King was now in the Month of Octob. at Lincoln, providing to go to meet the Duke his Rebel, and with such strength as he surely confided in. He was greatly incens'd against the Duke for so bad a Requital of the extraordinary Gifts and Honours he had bestow'd upon him, which made him stile the Duke, The most untrue Creature living, in a Postscript under his own Hand, to a Letter to the Bp. of Lincoln his Chancellor, now absent and sick; ordering him by some fit Officers of the Chancery, to send him the Great Seal, which he should have occasion to use. The Original is still preserv'd in the Tower, and friendly shew'd me by Mr. Geo. Holmes, Deputy Keeper of the Records. It ran to this tenor.

|| This Note of Buck, is scarce agreeable with the Kings Gift to this Rauf Banister, (for so was his Christian Name, and not Humphrey) and with the King's Commendation of his Service in his Letters Patents For he gave him the Manour and Lordship of Ealding in Kent, late belonging to the D. of Buckingham. So the Letters ran, Richard, &c. " to al and singular the Officers, &c. ### The ARGUMENT of the Second Book of the LIFE and REIGN of RICHARD III.

The Earl of Richmond practiseth with Foreign Princes, and with the English Nobles for Assistance and Forces to make his First and Second Invasions of England; he came first to Poole with Ill Success, secondly to Milford cum bonis avibus. What Bastards are, and whereof they are capable, who be of the House of Lancaster; how Lancaster and Beaufort, or Somerset differ. Bastards of Kings must not take the Surnames of the King or Kingdom. The Honourable Privilege of the Name of Plantagenet. Prince Edward and Queen Anne, John de la Poole proclaim'd Heir of the Kingdom by Richard the Third. Bastards of John Duke of Lancaster made Legitimate and Capable of Offices, Honour and of Heritage by Richard II. and the Parliament. What the Legitimation of the Pope is. Arms and Names of Princes Bastards. The Nobility of King Henry VII. He assid not much in the Titles of York and Lancaster. The Pope giveth to him the Title, De jure Belli, & de Domo Lancastria. The greatness of the Title of York; of Counsel and Counsellors. The Prerogative of the King in Judgments and Controversies. The Earl of Richmond landeth at Milford Haven; his Entertainment there and in Wales: His Aptness for divers Wives: He marcheth to Bosworth: King Richard and he Fight; Richard is overcome and slain, also the Duke of Norfolk by the Earl of Oxford (ut Creditur). The Earl of Richmond is straight Crown'd King in the Field: The fatal Error of King Richard: King's lov'd Combat: The Titles of King Henry VII. Kings go not now to Wars: Cruelties committed upon the Body of King Richard: He was attainted of Treason, tho' against the Laws of Nature and of Royal Majesty, with many of his Followers and Servants: The Earl of Surrey how released out of Prison; his Genealogy from Hewardus Walter de Buck, and his Progeny.

WE left King Richard the Third in the growth of a flourishing and promising Estate, and his Fate now, in the rise of a peaceful and prosperous Reign, of a calm and hopeful Prefage: But Fortune, that lends her Smiles as Exactors do Money, to undo the Debtor, soon call'd for the Principal and Interest from this Prince, to whom she was merely Novercal, and he might well call her, with the expert Heroes in Euripides, Fortuna diurna, i. e. Fortune of a Day's life; for in her best Mood, she is most slippery in her Favours and tedious in her Mischiefs, as was aptly consider'd by a grave Man; Vale. Max. Fortuna adversas res cupido animo inducit, secundas parco; She is a Mother but a little while, a Step-Dame a long time, and for ever to some; here then we are aggressing into the Turbulent and Luſtful Times, which were towards the end and period of his Life and Reign; the Formal and final Causes happening from the Invasions attempted by the Earl of Richmond. I will begin the Second Book there, and may say Invasions, because he twice invaded the Kingdom, tho' by Error or Ignorance of our Vulgar Historians they are confounded and made one, which corruptly maims the Story, and conceals and pretermits some very remarkable Agitations; particularly, the true Cause of the Duke of Buckingham's Ill Success and Defeat is misunderstood, or not at all known. To come to it therefore more certainly, we must take notice of the First Preparation by the Earl of Richmond, who was resolv'd to advance his Claim that way, and unbofoms himself to the Duke of Brittain, his Possibility and Advantage by Friends, if he could raise but sufficient Strength to set him safely in England. The Duke gives him all good Wishes to his Undertaking, but opposes (against all Arguments of drawing him in) first, his Amity and League with England, which in Honour and Justice he was not to violate: Then his Wants by the long Civil and Cruel Wars with his Barons, that had so exhausted his Coſſers, as durst he dispense with the former Cause, yet that might render him excused, 1484. excused, being unable to furnish him, at least in so short a time as his Expedition required; beyond which Answer, for the present, the Earl thought not fit to press him. But having a prompt and strong Affiance in his good Fortune, makes up to some of the Duke's most honourable and powerful Friends, to lay Siege that way to him by private Advantages; for by his ingenious Demeanour he had won the Inclinations of many Great Ones, being Master of a pleasant acute Wit, which was well supply'd in him by the strain of all Courtly Acts; to those he had the help of the French Tongue, which he spoke excellently well; and, to give the more plausible Access and Influence, he was (as Philip de Comines, who knew him, testifies) a very Compleat and well Featured Gentleman which makes the Rule certain, and well animating;

The Beauties of the Mind more gracious are,
When as the Bodies Features are more fair.

In the number of those Eminent Persons he had gain'd during his Fair Imprisonment, more fortunately he had apply'd himself unto the Lady Margaret Dutcheſs of Brittain, Daughter of Gaston de Foix (a Great Man in the Western Parts of France, whose Ancestors were well affected to the English) and Madam De Bervier the Dutcheſs, so far countenanced him in his Design, that she became an earnest Suitor unto the Duke her Husband, and prevailed both for his Liberty and Aid; for Caution and Pledge herein, he was only to kneel at the High Altar, before the blessed Sacrament, in the Cathedral Church of St. Vannes, there to make his Religious Vow, justly and truly to observe what Restitution he privately had promised to the Duke and Dutcheſs; which Protestation made, he had three Ships well rigg'd and furnish'd with Men, Arms and Victuals, as my Author relates.

But, by the favour of this British Writer, the Earl staid many Days at St. Malo, to receive and send Intelligence, and made it the beginning of October 1484, before he came to St. Poole in Dorset, where he lay some time at Anchor, to send his Boats a Shore as Explorers or Spies, for discovery of the Coasts, where the King's Army or his Friends lay, who return'd without any particular Satisfaction, but that there was many arm'd Men about the Country. The Earl (who in all things was circumspect, and cautiously timerous) resolv'd immediately to loose from thence; but the Night following, a terrible Tempest constrain'd them with all haste to weigh Anchor and make into the Maine, the Storm and Darknes of the Night severing and dispersing their Ships, some to the Coasts of Brittain, but the Earl himself to the Coasts of Normandy. And this was the success of his First Invasion, which, though it bore an inauspicate Face, it proved of a friendly Event: For had he landed about Poole, or but stay'd till the King's Ships had come in, that lay waiting not far off, he had been a lost Man every way; the King being not only active to meet their Contrivements, but had some advantage upon them, by the close Intelligence of a Friend, and knew that the Forces of the Duke of Buckingham, with the Earl of Devon and others, were to meet near Gloucester, and march in their full and united 1484. Strength to'ards the Sea-coasts of Dorset, there to receive the Earl: But the King encounter'd with the Duke of Buckingham's Army, Beat him, and cut of his Head, before any of the rest could come at him, daily putting the Ordinary Bands of these West Countries in a ready Posture for Guard of their Coasts; and that if the Earl of Richmond or any of his French Forces came ashore, they were to be Entertain'd courteously by them, pretending themselves of the Duke of Buckingham's Army, who had Routed the King's Party, and were sent thither to receive and conduct the Earl with his Men to London. This was the projected End: But 'tis of remarkable Note, to look into the various Paths of this Earl's Fortune, and how they brought him to his Journey's End, when they appear'd most doubtful and threatening, not only gave him Advantage by the good Success of his Enterprises, but made the most adverse Accidents serve as prosperous unto them; for was it not happy the Storm at Poole drove him from the Coasts of England, and no less fortunate, that the Duke of Buckingham was defeated, whereas, had the Duke atcheived that Day, the Earl of Richmond not being there, (who was to be present in Person, and General of the Field) we may with reason conjecture his Emulation and Policy would have accumulated the Honour and Fortune of the Conquest to his own pretended Title: such Spirits like the Sea, where they intrude or win, making their Advantage their Right, and not easily surrender, so much is the Engagements of Ambition, too strong for all Ties of Faith and Right.

The Example is observable in the Earl of Richmond himself; who altho' he knew the Children of the Duke of Clarence and others, had better Right to the Crown, yet once possess'd would not resign, no not to his own Son whilst he could hold it; nor did he want his Presidents, as all Men know, who know any thing. And to take all Relations in our way that may be level with our Story, betwixt this and his Second Invasion, some other Passages offer themselves, as an Interim, and not impertinent to supply the Reader's Observation.

The Death of the King's dear and only Son (at least Legitimate) who died in the Castle of Middleham in Yorkshire, in the Month of April, Anno Dom. 1484. gave such a passionate Charge upon the Nature and Affections of the King and Queen (being then in the Castle of Nottingham) that as mine Author saith, Subitis doloribus insanire videbantur.

The Death of Edward Prince of Wales, Son of Richard 3. Chron. Croyland. Ibidem.

Yet the King being a Man of an equal Moderation to his Courage, puts it into the Scale of his other worldly Encounters; and as it was said of Julius Caesar, That he soon pass'd the Death of his only Daughter Julia (most precious in his Affection) Et tam facile dolorem hunc, quam omnia vicit; so King Richard temper'd his Grief and Business so together, that the One made him not unsensible, nor the other negligent; but as the Prior of Croyland telleth, did all things gravely and discreetly as before.

Seneca.

Rex Richardus nihilominus tamen suam partem defensione vacaverit: Altho' the Queen could not hold so proportion'd a Temper over her Grief, the Tenderneſs of her Sex letting it break upon her in a more passionate manner, and with such an Impression, that it became her Sickness past recovery, languishing in Weakneſs and Extremity of Sorrow, until she seem'd rather to overtake Death, than Death her; which was not long after the Prince's, and added not a little to the King's Sufferings and Sorrows, (tho' traducing

 ning her Life by Poison or some other Practice, which are prestigious and black Comments, falsly plac'd in the Margent of his Story, and may more nearly touch the Credit of the Author's than his, if we judiciously take a view of him and his Actions; and look upon the indulent and active Care for his Country, which he gave a constant and sincere Expression of, instantly after his Son's Death, when by the Deliberation and Consent of the Barons, he was industrious to think of a Successor, and to nominate such an One, whose Blood and Worth might make him equally Heir to the Crown and the Peoples Affection, (with the highest approbation of the Kingdom) and none more near to either than Sir John de la Poole Earl of Lincoln, Son and Heir of John de la Poole Duke of Suffolk, and of the Lady Elizabeth Plantagenet, Dutches of Suffolk, the Sister and Heir of this King Richard, who was declared and proclaim'd Heir apparent to the Kingdom. This was a Contrecarre to the Faction of Richmond, and, indeed, what greater Affront could thwart them, if those of the House of Lancaster or Beaufort were next Heir to the Crown, (as the Pretenders affirm'd for the Earl of Richmond) who would likewise have him to be Caput gentis Lancastriae, & Prin-cepts Familiae, tho' they could scarcely prove him (not without question I am sure) Membrum il-lius Familiae, until he came to be King, for it was a Question in those Times, and much disputed, whether the Beauforts or Somersets were of the House of Lancaster or no? Most true it is, the Children of the House of Lancaster being lawfully Born, and after Henry Plantagenet
 Duke of Lancaster had conquer'd and deposed
Richard II. were to be held Princes of the Blood Royal, and capable of the Crown in their natural and due order. But those of Beaufort or Somerset were, as the Vulgar hath it, Filii Populi, or as the Imperial Juris-consults say, liberi vulgo questiti, who by the old Greeks were term'd 'Αναγής, i. e. sine Patre, the Doctors of the Spiritual Law, drawing the Originem of such Children
ab illicito & damnato coitu, of the polluted adulterous Bed (and so those Beauforts, three Males and one Female, begotten by John of Gaunt as he believed) according to the Laws were to be reputed, the Children of Sir Robert Swinford, begotten upon Katharine his Wife in his life time,
 who was Daughter of Sir Payen Roget a French Man, dwelling in Beauforts, and was Guyen Herald to the Duke of Lancaster. His Dutches Dona Constantia (a most Noble and Virtuous Lady, Daughter of Don Pedro King of Castile) was living also in the time he kept this Katharine and had those Beauforts, who were Surnamed so from the Place of their Birth, a Town of his own in Anjou. But to Note transitu, how obnoxious this Duke made his Frailties, that (thinking to put a smoother Face upon his Sin) gave it but the same Blush, by making this Katharine Swinford his Dutches, against the liking of the King and all his Noble Friends, and direct Ten-nor of the Common Laws, which pronounce Marriages between such as have lived in Adultery unlawful: Nay, to make him the more Marvaile and Smiling Discourse of the Court, the Glafs of his Age was turn'd to his last Year, when he sacrificed these scatter'd Embers of his Desires and Passion. But he obtain'd those Children to be legitimated: First, by the Pope Urbanus the Sixth; next by the Charter of King
Richard II. and had both these Indulgences afterward enlarg'd and confirm'd by Parliament.
 Yet neither these four Legitimate Children, nec

qui nascebantur ab illis, were permitted to the Princely Familiar Title of Lancaster, so long as that Name flourish'd, much less of Plantagenet, for that was the peculiar Sir-name in chief of the Kings of England and Princes of the Blood Royal, since the time of the Second Henry, Son of the Empress Mirilda, the first Founder of that Name in the Royal Family of England. Of which Honour were Partakers the Princely Family of Wales, of Brotherton, of York, of Lancaster, of Clarence, of Woodstock, of Gloucester, &c. And there are yet some Noblemen in Portugal, who descended from John Duke of Lancaster, and are call'd and written de Lancastria, others of the like Origin and Title may do as much. Neither would King Henry IV. Henry V. nor King Henry VI. all Kings of the Lancastrian Race in-dure to let the Lineage of Beaufort (tho' they respected them as Kinsmen, and advanced them to many Honours) assume the Sirname of Lancaster, holding it an Arrogation and Usurpation of Royalty and Royal Rights, wherein they follow'd their Ancestors, who devised other Names for their Base Children; as Fitz-Roy, Oxenford, Fitz-Herbert, Clarendon, Fitz-Henry Longuee &c.
Cornwall; and so they continued the Name of Beaufort and Somerset until the Earl of Richmond came, and this was in imitation of the Kings of France as I conceive: For within the reach of my Observation, since the time of Hugh Capet, they never vouchsafed any of their Base Sons to be capable of the Crown of France, or to have the Adven (as they call it) nor the Sirname of France; but the Illegitimate Daughters may take the Sirname France or de France, because they can make no Claim to the Crown by a pretended Permission of a Salick-law, which John de Tillet witnesseth.

*La troisieme lignée a du tout rejecté, les Bastards
 non seulement de la Couronne mais aussi de l'adven, & Surnom de France, qui Concession est permis aux Ba-

And as the Bastards of the Kings of England had other Names, so they took differenc'd Arms, or else were permitted to bear their Mother's (if of any Family). If tolerated to bear the Arms of England; then they were Diversify'd in a checking, debasing and rebating manner, with Bastons, Bends, Sinister Bars, Bordures, Marks of Baseness, Obscurity and Novelty, which any new Gentleman might bear, such as the Learn'd call'd Filios terra & novos Homines; and we vulgarly, Upstarts. But to object against the use of this in England, the Example of Hamelin is brought in; and to credit it, his Arms forg'd by some weak and negligent Heralds, who call him Hamelin Plantagenet; when the truth is, this Hamelin (Base Son of Jeffrey Plantagenet, Earl of Anjou) was simply call'd Hamelin, and his Son
William took the Sirname of his Mother Dame
Isabel de Warren, Daughter and Heir of William de Warren Earl of Surrey, which their Posterity continued; as Joannes de Warren the First, and Joannes de Warren the Second, both Earls of Surrey; and Isabella de Warren and Eliana de Warren, &c. mention'd in the Charters and Records,
 but never Plantagenet, which is acknowledg'd by our best Heralds and Antiquaries; Mr. William Cambden hath these words, Isabella Filia sola Gulielmi de Warren Comitis Surria Hamelinum Nothum Galfredi Plantageneti, &c. Titulo Comitis Surriae maritum exornavit. Hamelinus Gulielmum Surriae Comitem genuit, cujus posteri a scito Warrenorum Nomine eundem Titulum gesserunt.
 And that the Base Son of King Edward IV. was commonly call'd Arthur Plantagenet proves nothing neither, well considered: For in the Times

Times when this Arthur lived, the Name of Plantagenet being only left in the House of York, (the Lancastrian Plantagenet being more extinguish'd) had not the former Honour and Reputation, but was darken'd and setting, rather drawing a Contempt and Hate to them that bare it, the White Rose daily fading and withering; and so malignant was their Planet then, that, as a learned Gentleman hath further observed, It was not safe in that time to be a Plantagenet; therefore, the Permission of those Times can be no Warrant for the Objections, nor the Ignorance of the Poetical Heralds, who have strain'd this Fable of Hamelin. Yet farther, not only giving him and his Posteris a false Sirname, but assign'd him by the like Fabulous Art, a Shield of familiar Ensigns, the Arms of France border'd with an Orle of Normandy or Guyen; which he, nor yet any of the Antique Lineage of Anjou or their Progeny ever bear, or could by just Title bear, either simply or compounded, or the Progenitors of our English Kings the Lillies of Gold in an Azure Field, until King Edward claim'd the Crown of France, and assum'd them in the Right of Queen Isabel de Valois his Mother, who was the first that bare them quarterly with the Arms of England.

Scarboucle, falsely call'd Carbuncle.

Difference between the House of Lancast. and Somer. set.

The Earls of Worcester from whom.

But the Arms of the ancient Earls of Anjou were a Scarboucle, (that is, a Golden Buckle of a military Scarf or Belt, set with Precious Stones) not a Carbuncle or more precious Ruby, for the Term is erroneous and absurd, if consider'd: The Princes of Anjou bare this Scarboucle in a Shield party per Chief, Argent and Gules; and the Heirs of this Hamelin (who took the Sirname of Warren) bare also the Arms of the House of Warren in their Shields and Caparisons, but bare the Scarboucle of Anjou for their Crest, as they were descended out of that House, as I have seen upon a Seal of Joannes de Warren Earl of Surrey, at a Charter, dated 20 Edw. III. Ann. Dom. 1346. apud Dom. Rob. Cotton, which hath given me occasion to speak thus much to cure the Blemish that mistake hath thrust into History, such Absurdities having their Infection, and passing by an Age or two upon the easy and common Judgments, after grow up for tall and undeniable Truths: For some merely reading the Complexion of things, as they do Men by their outsidings, or as Boys Poetry, with tickled Faith; through such wide Ears and Observations, crept in that Parasitism on the one side, and Pride and Usurpation on the other side, that made the House of Lancaster and the Beauforts, alias Somersets, all one; which (whilst the House of York flourish'd) were held to differ as much as Royal and Feudal, Sovereignty and Suzerainty; for their Modesty at first was very well pleased with that of Beaufort, and it seem'd Honourable enough until the Children of John de Beaufort, the eldest Brother (being Earl of Somer) assumed the Name of their Fathers greatest Honour and Earldom for their Sirname, and the rest following, quite left the Name of Beaufort, and made the other Hereditary. From this John de Beaufort Earl of Somer and Marquess of Dorset, descended Henry Duke of Somer, Father Natural to Charles Somer, created Earl of Worcester by King Henry VIII. And 'tis worth the noting, that this Duke Henry left the Faction of Lancaster to follow Edward IV. The first Beauforts legitimated by the Pope, and Richard II. have no other Sirnames but Beaufort in either of the Instruments Apostolical, nor any Words to give or emure them to any Capacity of Royal Title, or State of Sovereignty in the Crown, only purged them by the Pope's Spiritual Power from the foulness of Bastardy, allowing them as Children legitimate and lawfully born, but gives 'em no other Title than Joannes de Beaufort Miles, Henricus de Beaufort Clericus, Thomas de Beaufort Domicellus, Joanna de Beaufort Domicella, and more the Pope cannot do. As the Doctors of Sorbone, and some of the best Canonists hold, who peremptorily affirm, That the Pope cannot make Bastards capable to inherit the Hereditary Lands of their Father; neither can give them power to constitute Successors or Heirs, or hold Offices, Dignities, or Titles, without the Prince's special Dispensation, to which the Civil and Imperial Laws agree, and is authentick in England, as a learn'd and eminent Judge reports, though others think it of too severe a nature, and moderately agreeable to Reason and Law (the Law much observing Reason) That Bastards being honest and worthy Men (the rather if they be avow'd by their Fathers) may be admitted to Honours, Dignities, Titles, Feuds and other Ornaments of Rewards and Virtue. Of this Indulgence and Connivence, we have Examples in England by two worthy and deserving Men, (flourishing this Age) who, tho' Bastards, held the greatest Offices in England. So Rich. II. in the Charter for the Legitimation of the Beauforts, would have Men of Desert (and avow'd by their Fathers) capable of Advancement and Honours. The Tenor of which Charter and Confirmation of it by Parliament I shall exhibit, as it is taken out of the Archives and Tower Records, opening the way by a short Advertisement, That in this Act of Parliament there is an Induction to the Charter, made by Dr. Edmond Stafford, Brother to the Earl of Stafford and Bp. of Exeter, Lord Chancellor of England in the 20th Year of Richard II. which intimateth, That Pope Urbanus VI. at the earnest Request of the King, vouchsafed to legitimate these Beauforts, the Base Sons and the Daughter of the Duke of Guyen and Lancaster: That the King also, having power to legitimate and enable Bastards in the same kind, and in as ample manner as the Emperor hath or had, for so he press'd and avow'd in the Act, was pleas'd at the Humble Request and Suit of the Duke their Father, to make them not only legitimate, but also capable of Lands, Heritages, Titles, Honours, Offices, Dignities, &c. And that the King, for the more Authority thereof, crav'd the Allowance and Favourable Assent of the Barons in Parliament, which was granted: The Charter runs thus;

A Charter of Legitimation of the Bastards of John D. of Lancaster.

“RICHARD, by the Grace of God, King of England and France, and Lord of Ireland; To Our most Dear Cousins, the illustrious John Beaufort Kt. Henry Beaufort Clerk, Thomas Beaufort Gent. and Joanna Beaufort Gentlewoman, of Our most renowned Uncle, the Noble John Duke of Guienne and Lancaster, Children German and Our Lieges, Greeting. We for the Honour and Merits, &c. of Our Uncle, out of Our own Good Pleasure, and in consideration of his Deserts, because you are conspicuous for your Virtuous Inclinations, and Honesty of Life and Manners, and descended of Royal Progenitors, &c. Hence it is, that mov'd by the earnest Entreaties of Our Uncle, your Parent, to remove from you (for as is said) there is a Defect in your Birth) this Defect and all its present Consequences, We will that you be and be reputed Capable, to be preferred, promoted, elected, assumed and admitted to any Honours, Dignities, States, Degrees, Offices Publick and Private, as well perpetual as temporary, and judicial and noble, by what Appellations soever distinguished, whether Dukedoms, Principalities, Earldoms, Baronies and Feuds, whether mediately or immediately depending or holden of Us, and them to take hold of, and enjoy as freely and rightfully, as if you had been born in lawful Matrimony, all Statutes and Customs of Our Kingdom of England, to the contrary enacted or observed, as if they were here mentioned at length, notwithstanding; with which, out of the Fulness of Our Royal Power, and with Consent of Our Parliament, by the Tenor of these Presents We dispence, and you, and every one of you, to Birth Restore and Legitimate. — Day of Feb. in the 20th Year of Our Reign. R. II.

Here we find large Graces, Honours and Privileges conferr'd upon those Beauforts; for the King calls then Consanguineos suos, and not only confirms their Legitimation, but makes them (by the help of the Parliament) capable of Baronies, Earldoms, Dukedoms, and Principalities; enableth them for all Offices publick and private, temporary and perpetual, to take hold of and enjoy all Feuds, as well noble as other, all Lands and Seignories Hereditary, as lawfully, firmly and rightfully, as if they had been born in lawful Matrimony, but yet confers no Royal Title nor Interest in the Crown, at the least, to the observation of those who allow not the Claim of the Beauforts and Somersets, and say, that to reach that, there must be Words of a higher intent, Words of Empire, Majesty and Sovereignty; such as Regni summa potestas; Corona; Sceptrum, Diadema, Purpura, Majestas, and the like: Neither of these, nor any importing their extent, being in this Grant, so no Title to the Crown or Sovereignty could pass to them.

To which the other Side replies, That there is a Word in the Charter that comprehendeth Empire, Reign, and Sovereignty; that is, Principatus; whereof the King and Parliament make the Beauforts capable, Principatus being the State of Princeps, a Title of the most absolute Sovereign Power; for the Roman Emperors in their greatest Height, were call'd Principes, therefore Princeps is thus defined; Princeps est penes quem summa Reip. potestas est, & qui primus omnium dominatur; and Principatus and Dominatus are used as Synonymies. But it is conceiv'd an Error now, to take Principatus for Regnum, or Supremus Dominatus, being the word Principatus long before, and in the Age of Richard II. also ever since, hath been restrain'd to the Estate of Primogenitus and Heir apparent, not only of Kings, but also of Dukes and Marquesses, as well Feudal as Sovereign. And the next King Henry IV. a wise, discreet, and wary Prince, though he was much inclined to those Beauforts, (as being his Natural Brethren by the Paternal side, and willing to advance them all he could) yet he discover'd clearly enough by that certain Charter, in which he entail'd the Crown successively to his Four Sons, and to the Heirs of their Bodies, that he reputed not the Beauforts to be Lancastrians or near the Crown: Neither is there the least Clause or Mention to leave any Remainder therein to them: First, he entail'd the Crown to his eldest Son Henry Prince of Wales, after him to the Heirs of his Body; If they fail, then to Thomas of Lancaster his Second Son, and to the Heirs of his Body, so to his Third Son John of Lancaster, and to the Heirs of his Body. Lastly, to the Fourth Son Humphrey, and to the Heirs of his Body, for still, and for every Estate: The words are, Post ipsum successive Heredibus suis de ipsius corpore legitime procreandis, which is all, and implicatively an express Exclusion of the Beauforts. This Charter was confirm'd by Act of Parliament holden at Westminster the Two and Twentieth Day of December, in the Eighth Year of Henry IV. and seal'd with his own Signet. Upon the Dexter side of that, hung the Seals of sundry Lord's Spiritual; on the Left side, the Seals of the Lords Temporal Witnesses. And albeit, the Earl of Richmond could not so well and rightly bear the Name of Beaufort or Somerset, being a Tenitor by his Father, and so to be surnamed, or of some other Welsh Name (if there were any in his Family) by his Mother he was descended from the Beauforts; for the Lady Margaret, Countess of Richmond, was Daughter and Heir to Sir John de Beaufort Duke of Somerset, (p) and Grand-child to John of Gaunt, by Katharine the Wife of Orbo de Swinford, which John de Beaufort, was created D. of Somerset by Henry V. His Wife was the Daughter and at length the Heir of Sir John Beauchamp

The Charter of H. 4. for intailing the Crown.

This Charter I saw in the Hands of Sir Robert Cotton, and from it took these Summary Notes. The Nobleness & Family of Hen. E. of Rich.

Glover. 1413.

1483. of Blaise, and the Widow of Sir Oliver St. John when he married her: But the Earl of Richmond, by his Grandmother Katharine Queen of England, was descended from the Kings of France; and I have seen him in a Pedigree (drawn after he was King) deriv'd from the ancient Kings and Princes of Brittain. Polidore saith, he was Ex fratre Nepos to King Henry VI. who call'd him Nephew, and he the King, Avunculum nostrum (our Uncle) instead of Patrum, as it is in the Records of Parliament, Ann. 1 of Hen. VII. but not his Nephew, as we erroneously now take it, that is his German younger Brother's Son, for then he had been a true Masculine Issue of the House of Lancaster and Royal Blood of England.

But he was Nephew to him by his Brother Uterine, Edmond Teudor Earl of Richmond, the Son of Owen Teudor or Meridock, and of Queen Katherine, Daughter of Charles the Sixth King of France, which the French well knew, and gave him the better Esteem for it, but those Honours were obscure Additions to him that must not go less than for a Prince of the House of Lancaster, and so of England, which pass'd with such vulgar credit in France, that Du Tillet mistook John Duke of Somerset, Father of Margaret Countess of Richmond, for the true and lawful Son of John de Gaunt, &c. by his first Wife Blanch Plantagenet, Daughter and Heir of the Earl (9) and Earldom of Lancaster. Philip de Comines, Lord of Argent, had better intelligence of his Pedigree and Title, which he gives us thus.

Il n'a voit croix, ny pile, ne null droit (Come je croy) a la Couronne d' Angleterre: And this expresses, he had no great Opinion of either, tho' he was then King when this was writ. But let us suppose him lawfully descended from that D of Lancaster, his Claim must stand excluded whilst the House of York survived; for Richard Plantagenet Duke of York and King of England Designat, by Act of Parliament holden 39 Year of King Henry VI. to whom these Titles of Prince of Wales, Duke of Cornwall, Earl of Chester, and Protector of England were given by the Three Estates in that Parliament, descended from the Daughter and Heir of the Second Son of King Edward III. (For as before, so still I leave the Infant William of Husfield without the Catalogue) and King Henry IV. and his Progeny, descended from the Third Son; and King Henry VI. being the best of the House of Lancaster then living, did acknowledge in that Parliament the Title of Richard Duke of York, the only lawful and just Title; so consequently next and better than that of Lancaster or any other; and before any Beaufort or their Heirs, the Issue of the two Daughters of John Duke of Lancaster; Philip and Katharine (married to the King of Portugal and Castile) were to be prefer'd if Foreign Titles be not excluded by Parliament. But the Earl of Richmond measuring his own Height by the Advantage of a Tumultuary and Indisposed Time, and finding his Lancastrian Pretence began to have a popular Retinue, he was now incompatible of any others Precedency and Propinquity: For those Great Ones that led him by the Hand into the Action, laid the Line by their own corrupted Hopes and Fears of the Success, therefore would not let the Fortune of their Expectation faint in him. Bishop Morton steer'd much in the course of their Affairs, and was a great Oracle to the Earl, who was noted too Partial and Credulous, especially where he believ'd the Persons of any Honesty, Virtue, or Learning, for which his Fame yet bears some Stains of Morton, Dudley, Empson, Bray, Ursewike, 1484. Knewett, &c. for there be two Extreames observ'd in the Counsels of Princes, one, when the Prince is subject to follow the Counsels of Evil Men; the other, when the Prince is too opinionated to consult with Counsel; such an one as was Charles the Hardy D. of Burgundy, so opinionated and overweening of his own Wisdom and Judgment, that he underthought all Mens else; which wide Conceit of his hath left this Monument.

And to give us yet a further Character of Bp. Morton, Sir Thomas Moor (sometimes his Master) tells us, his best Inclinations were sway'd to the dangerous Positions and Rules of Policy; and Dr. John Hird in his Metrical History of England, brings him in an Ambodexter and Observer of Fortune, one while Yorkizing, another while Lancastrianizing, thus delivering himself:

*Si Fortuna meis favisset partibus olim,
Et gnato Henrici Sexti diadema dedisset, Edwardi nunquam venissem Regis in aulam,
Sed quia supremo stetit hac sententia Regi,
Henrico auferre, ac Edwardo reddere Sceptum, Tanta mea nunquam lussit dementia mentem,
Ut sequeretur partes Regis victi atque sepulti,

If smiling Fortune had my Party own'd,
And the Sixth Henry's Offspring had enthron'd;
I'd ne're have struck to Royal Edward's Claim,
Nor fill'd his Court, assistant to his Fame:
But since all-potent Heaven had so decreed
Henry shou'd fall, and Edward shou'd succeed,
No stupid Madnefs cou'd my Mind misguide
With a dead King prepos't'rously to side
Against a living Victor

Which may be thought well said by a mere Politician, but from a Friend it wants something of a Christian; for true Friendship and Piety will own us in the blackest Adversity and Silence of the Grave, as the Divine Ariosto hath something near observ'd in this elegant Stanza.

*Nessun puo super du chi sia amato
Quando felice in sola urota si ede;
Pere ch' ha iveri, & i finiti amici alato,
Chi mostran tuti, una medesima fede,
Se poi si cangia in tristo il besto stato,
Volta la turba adulatrice il piede,
Et quel di cuor' ama riman' forte,
Et amai l' suo amico doppola morte.*

cant. 19.*

No Man whilst he was happy ever knew Assuredly of whom he was belov'd,
For then he hath both feigned Friends and true,
Whose Faith seems both alike till they be prov'd;
But he is left of all the flattering Crew
When from his happy State he is remov'd:
But he who loves in Heart, remains still one,
And loves his Friend when he is dead and gone.

Dr. Morton's Aims were drawn from other Rules, which with good Alacrity, made him Archbishop and Lord Chancellor of England, and put him the next List into a Cardinalship, and then he stood on Tiptoes by the King, according to the Roman marshalling of States; for in the Pope's List of Ranges and Presence, his Holiness is the first, then the Emperor, next a Cardinal, then

Moor* notes the extremity of his Pride, to abuse his Wisdom and Piety, which otherwise might have kept Him and his Memory unsully'd in these Preferments, so much our Vices impostumate our Fames, Hypocrisie leaving the Scar but of a deform'd Cure upon it at best.

Fra. Goodwin in Catalogo Episcoporum.

But Dr. Goodwin, Bishop of Hereford, presents him nearer (as it were) in his Domestick Nature, and reports when Dr. Morton was Archbishop of Canterbury, he exacted and extorted a far greater Sum of Money from the Clergy of his Diocess than was ever before, and for his private Commodity (which he covetously sought) brought certain Leams or bigger Ditches to his own Grounds about Wishitch, from the River Nine, which was before Navigable, and of much publick Use, but hath since serv'd for little or none.

Job. Stow.

And John Stow says, he was the stirrer up of those great and grievous Taxes which rais'd the People to Arms and Rebellion. These Notes of his Natural Dispositions stuck like Wens upon the Face of his Religion, and from that Mind, whereby Affections justle Religion and Conscience out, how hazardous may the Power and Counsel of such be, to the Inclinations of a Wife Prince; but this Prelate made his so canonical, and fitted them to the Times, and his Temper, that they deceived not his Expectation, but brought him home to his Ends, and to the Favour of a provident and wise Prince; that he was so, the World must justly avow; and in all his Actions, we may see him of a safe and contracted Wisdom, govern'd by a most cautelous Spirit; as great a Husband of those Virtues he had, as of his Glory; not too Modest (if I be not much mistaken) to hear of either; of both which he hath left us pious Tastes. But the most surviving addition of Memory, is that great

Example of Majesty and her Sex, Qu. Elizabeth, who was said to be like this King her Grandfather, as well in composition of Qualities, as Favour and Lineaments, that she was his lively and perfect Image; and to use an even Hand in the Extention of Himself and his Power, it must not be denied, (how far off soever he was at first) after the Crown yielded to him, he was the true Proprietary of all the Rights and Titles which carried it, or had dependency thereon, and to colleague all in a full and perfect strength, the Title of York was confirm'd to him by Marriage of Elizabeth Plantagenet, eldest Daughter of Edward IV. Prince or Head of that Family, to whom the Title of Lancaster instantly escheated as he was King, which before was in controversy or in nubibus, or *Abbeyance (as our Lawyers say) for no Man being a Subject, how Capital and Chief a Judge, or of what Judicatory Power soever, could give a Definitive Sentence, in any ambiguous Cause or Act of the King: But the King himself which is an ancient and authentick Paragraph in the Laws of England, as learned Judge Bracton affirmeth.

De Chartis, & de factis regum non possunt Justiciarii disputare, nec si disputatio oriatur, possunt eam interpretari, sed in dubiis & obscuris, & ubi aliqua dictio contineat duos intellectus, Domini Regis erit expectanda interpretatio & voluntas, &c.

The reason is given in the Books of the Civil and Imperial Laws peremptorily, quia de principali Judicio non est disputandum. So that Controversy, whether the Beauforts or Somersets were of the House of Lancaster, or capable of the Crown or no, cou'd not be determin'd until there came a competent Judge, a King, and King of England, who by that Vertue and Power decreed to himself, the Title of Lancaster, with all the Royal Appurtenances confirm'd by the Pope, as 1485. proper to him, and then the Writers, both English and French, had some colour to say he was De la ligne de Lancastrre, & caput gentis regalis & Princeps Familie Lancastriensis.

But the Chancellor Morton, by a more happy and plausible Insinuation, term'd the Marriage an Union of York and Lancaster, and not improperly, nor without a very favourable acceptance to the King, (at least in the beginning of his Reign) though after (as may be observ'd) he thought those Attributions but small Wyers to hold the Weight and Consequence of his Crown; nay, so slender was his Affiance, (or rather none at all) in his Titles of York and Lancaster, much less of Somerset, that he seem'd tacitly to wave and quit them, and stuck to that of his Sword and Conquest; for the more publick Vote and Knowledge whereof, there was at his Coronation, Proclamations made with these Titles, Henricus Rex Angliæ Jure Divino, Jure Humano, & Jure Belli, &c. which the Barons could not fancy, nor condescend to, tho' the King peremptorily avow'd and maintain'd he might justly assume and bear it, having as a Conqueror entred the Land, fought for the Crown, and won it: They answer as peremptorily, That he was beholding to them, both for his Landing and Victory, and by their permission had that fair and prosperous Footing upon their Coasts; not by any Stroke of his French, who were not so many as the least Legion of the Romans, and had found but bloody Entertainment by the valiant English, if ever they had landed, besides, the Instigation of a mortal Hatred against the Invader, never to be extinguish'd, but with an utter Expulsion and Destruction, which they humbly pray'd might be worthy of his consideration, and not to take from his loving People the just due of their Affections, by ascribing so much of his Victory to the French, or his Welsh Sword; sith they voluntarily open'd their Arms and Country to receive him and put the Crown upon his Head; that this was their free and voluntary Act, they hoped he could not forget: And if so, why wou'd he make such an Atchievment, a Conquest, or a Purchase of the Sword? Terms of a most harsh and dissonant Sound to the English, who reputed them as barbarous and tyrannical, their Ends and Events to enslave Them, their Goods and Fortunes, under a Licentious Power, that might act and will any thing: Quicquid Victor audet, aut Victor timet? The Examples of the Conquering Goths and Vandals, Longobards in Italy and Spain, Saxons and Normans in England; and lately, the Spaniards in America, with many other Cruel Lords estated only by their unjust Arms and Swords, being fresh and bleeding Instances, that when but mention'd, stir up Thoughts of Horror and Detestation of the Sword's Title. But the more they oppos'd it, the more he is constant to have it assented by the Pope, with his Title of Lancaster, which he thought wou'd be a stronger Bridle to check all Murmurs, but yet endeavour'd it not directly and disertly, but under a close and borrow'd Pretext, the outside of his Embassy being only to obtain a Dispensation and Pardon for his Marriage, pretending a fear of Incest, his Wife being his Kinswoman; Et quanto Consanguinitatis & forsan affinitatis gradu, which Pope Innocentius the Eighth granted the first Year of his Reign, and afterward (upon what Occasion I cannot say) he renew'd the same Suit to Pope Alexander VI. who confirm'd and ratified the Pardon and Dispensation made by his Predecessors, in the Fourth Year of this King's Reign.

But 'tis observable, that the Pope herein taketh not upon him to confer or give any new Titles; neither did the King publicly solicit the Pope to confirm these Two Titles, his Ambassador had that Particular in his Private Instructions: So that by this, the Pope seemeth only to make a Rehearsal of those Titles as due and proper to him before, and the Titles De jure Belli, & de jure Lancastriae, seem'd not as any Matters or Subject of the Bull, but rather some Desire the Pope had, to express a Love and Honour to the King, and that he was pleas'd, Ex proprio & mero motu & certa scientia sua, to make such honourable Memorial of all the Majestical Titles in the King's Right, as the more stately Embroideries to his glorious Letters of Apostolical Indulgence, for the Dispensation of the said Marriage convey'd, and in these words:

After, for the more clear repairing and curing all Flaws and Defects of Titles, the Pope addeth this Gracious Clause; Supplemusq; omnes, & singulos defectus, tam juris, quam facti, si qui inter- venerint in Regno dicto.

And then in the End, not in the Front, this Bull is intituled, Pagina confirmationis nostrae, approbationis, pronuntiationis, constitutionis, declarationis, suppletionis, monitionis, requisitionis, prohibitionis, Benedictionis, inhibitionis, & excommunicationis, & Anathematizationis in quoscunq; qui presumpserint, infringere, vel ausu temeritatis, contravenire his literis Apostolicis.

For all this must be held, and thought to be done Autoritate Apostolica, i. e. by the Authority of the Apostles, St. Peter and St. Paul.

And thus the King received of the Pope the two Titles, De Domo Lancastriae, and De Jure Belli, without any seeking or Solicitation (as we are led to credit) for there appeareth not any express Suit or Motion by the King to that purpose, though by Circumstances and Probability it was prefer'd under Hand, for the other Things were but of slight Request and no necessity, nor obnoxious to any Danger; when those two Titles were the present Marks, his Aim was strongly and mainly directed to. Though, I must confess, after a while, he was as lightly satisfied in these (notwithstanding the Pope's Thunder and Lightning, added to them) as in the Titles of York and Lancaster, which he discover'd, and not obscurely, when he moved the Estates in his first Parliament, to grant an Estate Hereditary and Entail'd of the Crown and Kingdom, with all the Appurtenances, to the Heirs of his Body: beyond this he cou'd not require much, nor they give, which was unanimously condescended unto, as a Gift of a new Title confirm'd by their Act; the Copy whereof I have transcrib'd (where I come to rehearse the Titles of our Sovereign Lord the King, that now is). Nor is the Divination of this Piece so dark, but that the Cause may be guess'd at, why he held himself not safe in the Titles of York and Lancaster, of Beaufort and Somerset already touch'd at, but may fall more seasonably elsewhere into our Stories, without confounding it with Historologies, and presenting Matters out of their time and place; my Purpose only being, to take so much Light from the Story of Henry VII. as shall but properly conduce to the true shadowing and proportioning of K. Richard's, being necessarily inforc'd to inculcate such Matters as may seem of no present conclusion; yet losing their Observation, we shall want the knowledge of many things much pertinent to the Credit and Honour of K. Richard and his Actions: To which, according to the Orders and Affairs of Time, I am now to come again.

And here, upon our Account, we shall find it near upon Ten Months since the Duke of Buckingham was suppress'd, and the Earl of Richmond driven from Poole with the Storm, who was now again very busy raising fresh Preparations in France, and King Richard upon the Intelligence, as stickling to levy Souldiers, and re-inforce all his Havens and Frontier Places. But the Earl of Richmond found it not so easy a Matter now as at first, to draw a Party and Concurrence from France, having sped so ill in his former Undertakings, which indeed struck a great Discouragement in the Expectation of all his Favourers, and made his Welcome the colder to the D. of Brittain; the rather also, because he had been with the French King before he came to him, which was taken but ill, altho' the Earl cou'd not otherwise do, being forc'd upon the Coasts of Normandy; and coming into the Road at Dei-pe, landed, to Refresh Himself and Company: From thence he intended to Roan, which being so near Paris, engaged him thither to the King, being, (as Philip de Comines saith) follow'd in a very honourable Port, by 500 Englishmen. In his Stay there (to shew us how much Interest a provident and active Spirit hath in Fortune) he so heighten'd and sweeten'd his Behaviour to the Court, as conciliated the Favour and Respect of the Greatest and Noblest Persons to him. But most happily, the fair Opinion and Esteem of the Princely Lady Anne de France, eldest Sister to King Charles the Eighth; who had such an Influence upon him in his Minority, that she out-pitch'd Lewis Duke of Orleans, chief Prince of the Blood: In Envy or Mistrust whereof, he took Arms and raised a Civil War in France (as John Tillet and others write). She was Wife to Peirce de Bourbon Lord of Beaujen, after Duke of Bourbon; but Beaujen being his most stately and honourable Seignior, he was call'd Monsieur de Beaujen; and his Lady had so flexible an Inclination to the Earl of Richmond's Cause, that she importun'd the King to aid him with a good Sum of Money and 3000 Men, but odd Fellows: For Philip de Comines saith, they were Trois mille hommes les plus meschans que lux peut troit ver, no better than Rogues and Trewans, Men of base Quality and as low Courage. Whilst these were levying, the Earl (thrifty of all Opportunities, and as diligent to add what advantage of Time and Aid he cou'd) visits the Duke of Brittain to the same purpose. The Duke propounds it to his Council, which Peter Landois his Treasurer and Chief Counsellor objects against, with this Reason, That if the Enterprize succeeded well, yet the Event must fall out unhappily and ill to him; the Earl having now interest'd himself to the Favour and Assistance of Charles King of France: And this wou'd be the first Link of so strong an Engagement, that the Earl and his Confederacy must be lost to Brittain when he came to be King, being respectively tied to lend the King of France Aid against them, if any Cause shou'd happen, which the King of France had a prepared Stomach for, and had not been nice to seek any Provocation that might countenance a Quarrel against the Dutchy of Brittain, which was beyond his span, so long as they continued in League with England; that being untwisted, and France and England contracted, how easy was it for the French to invade and swallow up both him and his Dukedom. To make the present Advantage, there-

The second Invasion of the E. of Richmond.

The Pope's Charter for the Title of Lancaster, Et de jure Belli, &c. for the dispensing with the incestuous Marriage.

Comines, p. 536.

1485. fore, as profitable as safe, his Advice was to stay the Earl: The Duke knowing his Coſſers at that time very lank, and that the King of England wou'd offer well for him, approv'd the Counſel, and reſolv'd to be led by Landois (whoſe Reſpects (notwithſtanding) were very affectionate to the Earl). But whether by the ſecret Caution of ſome Friends, or ſuggeſted to him by his better Genius, ſure it is, by ſome unknown Means he had knowledge of it; and yet this was determin'd but at Night, and deſign'd for the Morning: But before Midnight, or the knowledge of their Flight, he, and Twelve Gentlemen his Followers, had left Vannes, and recover'd Anjou (under the French King's Protection) from thence to the French Court again, the King being ſtill very pliable and conſtant to his Promiſe concerning thoſe French Forces under his own Charge. The next thing he works at, is how to enlarge the Earl of Oxford out of the Caſtle of Hammeſ, committed thither by Edward IV. (and in this he uſes, or rather follow'd indeed) the Contrivement of Dr. Morton, who held good Quarter with the Earl of Oxford, and by his frequent Viſits, had a familiar and eaſy Door open'd, which the Earl readily took the opportunity of, leaſt it ſhou'd be ſhut again by ſome Miſcarriage, for Richmond thought, or found the Conſtitution of his Deſign not a little ſtrengthen'd by the Earl of Oxford's Confederacy: Nor did he miſtake himſelf in his Accompt, when he ſet him down of Special Uſe, knowing him a Man of an Eminent Power, wiſely and valiantly Temper'd: And to give him the ſtronger Preſumption and Confidence, one that moſt mortally hated Edward IV. and all the Houſe of York: To begin therefore an Obligation, the E. of

(r) He did not go to Hammeſ. See Sir Th. Moor's Hiſtory of Edward V. Richmond makes a Complemental Journey to Hammeſ (r) where the E. of Oxford was then, under the Charge of S. James Blount; He finds all honourable and reſpectful Entertainment, with ſit liberty and occaſion to propound himſelf unto the Earl who had been partly prepared by Dr. Morton, and therefore met him the neareſt way, engaging himſelf ſolely to the Premises, and (by virtue of an indefatigable Confidence) ſets upon his Keeper, wins him to the Faction, and to Paris with them. By which time, all Preparations were in readineſs; and whiſt they make this Stay in the French Court, the Earl of Richmond receives a fair Excuse and Proteſtation from the D. of Brittain, with offer of Auxiliary Forces: This Supply came very acceptably, and however he reſented the Duke's late Purpoſe upon him, his Wiſdom told him, he muſt now convert his Anger into Thanks, which he returns with a reciprocal Proteſtation and Order, to ſend the Troops to Harſlew, where his Shipping lay, and was the Rendezvous for his Souldiers.

In the end of July 1485. he took leave of the King and his moſt Noble Couſin Madam De Beaujen, departing for the Port of Harſlew in Normandy, where he met with Two Thouſand Brittains from the Duke honourably accommodated. But by the Way, he made ſome ſtay at Roſen, and had News which much diſtemper'd him, That the Lady Elizabeth was forthwith to be married to King Richard; this quicken'd his Haſte for England, preſuming, his landing would forbid the Banes, otherwiſe he might ſit down with folded Hands, for upon this Marriage inſiſted the main Hope and Conſequence of his Fortune; without her, all his great Pretexts would faint, yet ſeemed to hear it, as a thing that cou'd not concern him ſo much, having ſo preſent and provident a Wit, that in any Chance he wanted not Counſel and Determination in himſelf for all Fortunes; inſtantly reſolving to apply his Suit to her Siſter the Lady Cecily: But ere he could perfectly faſhion theſe Intentions, they were alſo countercheck'd by the next Paquet, which aſſured him the Lady Cecily was lately married: Neither did that (after ſome Collection) ſeem much to diſcompoſe him; but quickly, varying his Diſpoſition to his Fortune, he would now fix himſelf upon ſome Choice in Brittain, amongſt his noble Friends (for the moſt part Welſh-Men) and treats about a Daughter of Sir William Herberts, a Gentleman of an noble Alliance and principal Power in the South part of Wales; who had married the eldeſt Daughter, not long before, to the Earl of Northumberland, to whom the Earl of Pembroke (by a new created Friendſhip betwixt them) imboſoms the whole Deſign, and preſſes his Comprobatation in it; for by this means it was preſumed, the greateſt part of Wales would fall under their Command; which had been no ſmall Addition to a Banish'd Man's Fortune. Whiſt thoſe things were in their Mould, Dr. Morton gave him ſuch aſſurance, by Letters, of the Countries Readineſs to receive him, that it was thought beſt to take the Advantage of landing there; and in the Month of July they looſe from Harſlew, and ſafely arrived at Milford Haven in Pembrokeshire, his Native Country: After ſome Reſreſhing, he marches to a Town call'd Harverford Weſt, and was entering amongſt his Brittiſh Kindred, who welcom'd him as a Prince, deſcended from their ancient Princes of Wales, (the Country generally very noble and loving to their Friends) whiſt he continued amongſt them, Sir Rice ap Thomas, Sir Walter Herbert, Sir John Savage, Sir Gilbert Talbot (who drew his young Nephew the Earl of Salop into this Action with him) and divers others of all Qualities, brought or ſent their Forces. His Army thus ſtrong and united, he paſſes the Severne, and marches to Lichfield, purpoſing to hold on to London, if the King had not interpoſed it, who, though he lay at Nottingham when the Earl landed, and while he marched through Wales, had conſtant Spies upon him. But as no Policy or Law can ſecure their Faith, that think they may diſpence with it, ſo all Benefits are too narrow, where Ambition and Ingratitude urges Merit: And to ſhew there is not much of our Fate in our own Providence, when this King thought the Nobility moſt firmly cemented to his ſide, and was to put himſelf upon their Conſtancy, they make a preſent and general Deſluxion to the other; but he had heightned and contracted his Reſolution and Judgment to the greatneſs of his Cauſe, and was not now to be outbid by Chance or Danger. The next Day (which was Sunday about Evening) paſſing through Leiceſter in open Pomp, the Crown Royal on his Head; with him John D. of Norfolk, Maſhal of England, the Earl of Surrey, the Earl of Westmoreland, the Viſcount Loſel, and other of the Nobility and Gentry; at Redmore Heath the Armies came to an Interview, and put themſelves in array: The next Morning, early, there was ſome Conference held in the King's Tent, by thoſe Peers and others of principal Truſt, who gave him particular Information of all thoſe ſecretly revolted; and it much amazed him, the Earl of Northumberland was one, to whom he had ever been moſt conſtant and forward in his Reſpects and Favours; therefore where he had confer'd ſo much, he ſuſpected little. But no Obligations are religious if not held ſo. And altho' in the Conflict he ſtood but as neutral, yet the ſuddenneſs and example of it drew many from the King, even at the Inſtant stant when he was ready to arm himself: Yet this was not of so great and sensible amazement unto him as the Lord Stanley's Defection; who, in pledge of his Faith, had left his Son George Stanley, whilst his Wife (the Earl's Mother) had made her subtil Perswasions of stronger Tye, and sub-induced him to the Lancastrian Side, which he aided with 26000 Men, if Philip de Commines be not mistaken; for our Stories have but 5000. But it was a very great Defection, and made the Earl's Army far stronger; so that the chiefest Point of Consultation now, was how to preserve him by Flight, and the recovery of some Strong Hold, until the Tempest had scatter'd or spent its violence, which they conceiv'd could not be long, if the Camp broke up and once dissolved. But no Argument could fasten on him, tho' the benefit of a Swift Horse was offer'd at his Tent Door, nor the Fatality and Portent of Prodigies, related by his Friends, as presaging some inevitable Calamity, and that Propheticall Prediction,

Jack of Norfolk be not too bold,
For Dicken thy Master is bought and sold.

These things aggravated, the weakness of his Army objected, Counsels, Perswasions, Terrors, Prodigies, Prophecies, cou'd not make him hear, so fatally resolute he stood in the Jealousie and Reputation of his Honour and Valour, peremptorily protesting, He would rather adventure Life, Crown and Fortunes, than his Honour to a cowardly and sinister Construction. This might taste of a desperate Will, if he had not afterwards given an Apodixis in the Battel, upon what Plat-form he had projected and raised that Hope, which as it had much of Danger in it, so of an inconcuss and great Resolution, and might have brought the Odds of that Day to an even Bett; for knowing the Earl to be thirsty and appetent after Glory and Renown, but of an unpractised Skill in War, and as inferiour in Courage to him, he had projected (in manner of Stratagem) so soon as the Armies approach'd ready for the Charge, to advance himself before his Troops, and give the Earl, being General of his Forces, the Signal of a Combat. And to provoke and single him with a more glorious Invitation, he wore the Crown Royal upon his Head, the fairest Mark for Valour and Ambition. Polidore says he wore it, thinking that Day should either be the Last of his Life, or the First of a Better; which may as well be a reason of his wearing it Three Days before at Leicester, when he rode from thence to Bosworth. But doubtless, by it he intended chiefly, that the People might see and know him to be their King: And those that stood arm'd against him, looking upon that Imperial Evidence, where their own Hands and Voyces had set it, should by the Awe and Sovereignty of it, consider how lately they had avow'd him their lawful King; and by what Pledges of their Faith and Allegiances, they stood solemnly bound to defend him and his Title in it, against all other: Whatever was his Mystry, it render'd him a valiant and confident Master of his Right; and in the Constancy of Hope and Resolution, he gives order for the Battel: The Armies confronted, and whilst the Alarm and every Blow began to be hot and furious, forth breaks King Richard towards the Earl, wafting him by a Signal, who seem'd readily to accept it; and pricking his Horse forward came on very gallantly, as if but one Genius had prompted their Spirits and Ambition: For a good Author testifieth that Comes Rich- mondix directe super Regem Richardum, &c. But his Carreir soon faltred, and Mars became Retrograde, it being but a nimble Train, to draw the King on to some Disadvantages, or else he liked not his furious Approach, for suddenly he makes halt, and with as much Credit as he could (and no Harm) recover'd the Vanguard of his Army, whither Richard pursued him, with so much speed and fierceness, that he forc'd him to his Standard: And now, high in Blood and Anger (to see his Valour deluded by such a Politick Bravery) with his Sword makes way, and with his own Hand slew Sir Charles Brandon, Standard-bearer, thinking to have made the next Blow as fatal to the Earl; but the confluence of Souldiers interjecting, rescued him, Sir John Cheney being one of the foremost, whom the King struck from his Horse to the Earth; but charged and environ'd with Multitudes (that like a Storm came on him) Valiant Richard falls the Sacrifice of that Day, under their cruel Swords, so rabious in their Execution, as if his Body must suffer more, because they cou'd not kill his Better Part, mangling and wounding his dead Corps whilst it lies drencht in Gore.

Drag'd by the Hair to Hostile Swords a Prey,
And slain with barb'rous Wounds the vanquish'd Richard lay.

And after all (to complete their Barbarism) threw his Body behind One upon a Jade, and so convey'd it to Leicester. A Story to be thought incredible, at least to charitable and modest Ears, and highly upbraided by the happier and Christian Fame of William the Conqueror, who severely punish'd a Souldier for but hacking the Thigh of King Harold after he was dead, though an Usurper and his perfidious Enemy; with all nobleness causing the Body to be delivered to his Mother for an honourable Interment, which was solemnly celebrated in his own Abbey at Waltham.

The Battle thus fought and won, the Victor was crown'd in the Field with that Crown King Richard wore, which the Lord Stanley put upon his Head, and salutes him King, by the Stile of Henry VII. King of England, &c. And Henry Earl of Richmond Son of Edmund ap Meredith ap Teudor (alias of Hadham) Earl of Richmond, and of Margaret Daughter and Heir of John Beaufort Duke of Somerset attain'd to the Crown, and had the easier ascent by the Oversight and Remissness of Richard in that Catastrophe of his Reign, who gave too much Opportunity and Scope to the Actings of his Enemies when they were under his Power and Arm. And in the Fortune of his Judgment (at the closing of the Scene) that did not better pre-suppose his Enemy too prudent and reserv'd, to trust the Advantage he had upon so sharp and single an Hazard: But Richard believing he had the odds in Courage and Monomachy of him, which probably might make him Master of the Combat, and so of the Field (the Strait being so desperate too) resolv'd rather to trust to the Fate of his own Valour, than the Chance of an uncertain Escape; a Resolution not so rash and overweening, 1485. overweening as commendable, if we look upon the very Aims and Necessity of it; neither is it new or improper for Princes to demand the trial of Camp Fight, or Single Combat personally in their Armies, and to the Generals in their Absence: William the Conqueror challenged King Harold; Before that, a Combat was fought between Edmund Ironside and Canute the Danish King, for the whole Kingdom of England: Our Richard I. and Edward I. in Palestine proffer'd the like to several of the Pagan Princes; so did Edward III. Henry V. with the Kings of France.

The Challenge of James V. King of Scots to Tho. D. of Norfolk.

In the Last Age, the valiant Prince James the Fifth of Scotland, in person challenged Thomas Lord Howard, Duke of Norfolk, General for the King of England, who accepted it; but the King into his Demands would have the Country or Lands then in controversy, to be made Brabium victoris, which was without the General's Power to engage, being the Inheritance of the King his Master, but proffer'd better Lands of his own upon the Combate, which was not accepted, so that concluded nothing.

The better End of these Challenges and Combats, being at first level'd from Mercy and Piety, for by this Single Adventure, the Innocent Blood of Armies was (more than stanch'd) preserv'd, Foreign Stories brings this home to us, and highly Characters their Kings and Generals in the like Examples, which this Age draws a Curtain before as not fit for Imitation, making too desperate a Wound in a settled State and Succession; the first who rendred that (or some more Politick) Reason for Princes not to adventure themselves, was Philip II. King of Spain, (as a late Writer ascribeth) but is mistaken; for the more ancient Histories of Syria and Persia mention some Kings that refrain'd from Wars long before; as Herodotus, Diodorus, Trogus Pompeius tell us: But let us take measure from that Times, Wisdom, Valour, Policy, &c. to this, and we shall find them but tottering Foundations of States which cannot uphold themselves, or obvert the least Decree of God, when he intends to scourge or alter Kingdoms; for where such Vicissitudes are destin'd, the Counsels and Faculties of Men must be darkned, and there will fall out all Concurrences and Advantages to further that Purpose. So in the Extirpation and Transferring of Families, the Potter in Jeremy, breaking one Jarr to make another, whose fatal Commutations should extimulate the Piety of our Natures, and make us modest Cenurers of their Events: For as we see things but thro' a Cloud, whilst we measure them by Accidents, so we intrude on God's Providence, judging Men's Actions in their Success, while we overact our own. Of such a Composition was the Ill-wishers of King Richard, who forgot him not in his Grave, but endeavour'd to be equally cruel to his Memory: And in November following a Parliament was holden, in which he was attainted of High-Treason; a Strain very high to make him guilty of that, being a King, he could not commit. By the same Figure may others, who were stiled Chief Aiders and Assistants of King Richard in the Battel of Bosworth, as Sir John Howard Duke of Norfolk, &c. though some would have him retired from the Court all King Richard's Reign. Wake*, Thomas Billington, William Sapcoate, Will. Brampton, all Knights, and some Heralds at Arms, with divers other; an Act of Parliament being made to Disable and Forejudge them of all manner of Honour, State, Dignity; also to Forfeit all Mannors, Castles, Lordships, Hundreds, Franchises, Liberties, Advowsons, Privileges, Nominations, Presentations, Tene-ments, Rents, Suits, Reversions, Portions, Annuities, Pensions, Rights, Hereditaments, Goods, Chattels, and Debts. These be the words of the Act, and if ius, then ius summum in all Extremity.

Those of Note that were taken, lost their Heads at Leicester two Days after, being St. Bartholomew's-Day, and had a Glimpse like that Bartholomew in France in our Time; all such Slaughters from thence call'd Bartelemies, and Bartelemies, simply in a perpetual Stigma of that Butchery.

It is suggested, the Duke of Norfolk was slain in the Battel by the Earl of Oxford, and the Story of Croyland seemeth to say as much; Comes Oxoniæ valentissimus miles in eam alam ubi Dux Norfolciæ constitutus erat in agro (de Redmore) tum Gallicorum tum Anglicorum militum Comitatu stipatus tetendit, &c.

Amongst those that escaped the sad Destiny of that Day, was the Earl of Surrey, Sir Thomas Howard Viscount Lovel, Sir Thomas Stafford, and his Brother N. Stafford, and many other Nobles and Gentlemen that got into Foreign Countries and Sanctuaries, obscuring themselves till the Storm and Smart of that Day's Memory were past. But some would maintain Thomas Earl of Surrey to be one of them that submitted to the New King at Bosworth, immediately after the Overthrow, which must not be believed, if we understand the Composition of those Times and Affairs: For certain it is, the E. Richmond had peremptorily proscrib'd all those he had cause to fear or hate, whose Names are partly in the Rolls, kept in the Chapel of the Convertites in Chancery-lane, and partly omitted by the Scribes.

Now the Earl of Surrey, of all the rest, was so terrible and distasteful to him, there could be no Excuse left for his Life. And therefore let no Man think he was taken or submitted, but took an happier Season some Months after. The Relation and Truth is (by the Warrant of one that well knew him, and the Inter-passage of his Fortune) the Earl opportunely left the Field, but so wounded, that Faintness and Night constrain'd him to the House of a Gentleman not far from Nottingham, and one that bare a faithful Respect to the Earl and his Family, until he was recovered. In the mean time, that terrible Parliament held in the next November was concluded, and the King's Desires reasonably well appeased, in seeing the Execution of his New Laws past upon some of them.

After which, (some small distance of time) followed a gracious Pardon to all the Offenders in that Cause, which proffer'd Mercy this Earl laid hold on, hoping to restore himself (by his Submission) his offence, consider'd, being but an Act of Loyalty to his Master. But this confidence sent him to the Tower; for tho' the Violence of the Storm appear'd well calm'd, yet the

1485. to the protection of his Sword, which the Conquerour had chased out of their Country, who had fortified themselves in the Isle of Ely, and made Hawardus their General, where he built a Castle that a long time after had his Name. But the Normans took that Advantage to infest his Country, and put him again to the Recovery of it, which he so fortunately settled, that the Conquerour was contented to make him his, and hold him in good favour whilst he lived. He was buried in the Abbey of Croyland: Concerning his Issue by the Lady Turfrida, there is mention only of a Daughter named Turfrida, married to Hugo Enernua, Lord of Deeping: But circumstance will persuade us, he had other Issue, if we consider him in the likelihood of his Strength and Ability, and that divers continued of his Sir-name in that Country a long time after him, which makes it probable, he had a Natural Son, (at least, bearing his own Name of Heward) that next to him was the Original Ancestor of this House of Howards. And let it not be thought any Disparagement for a Noble Family to be raised from a Natural Issue; for many Princely Families have been deriv'd and propagated from Natural Sons, as was Eneas, Romulus, the Founders of the Roman Families; So was Theseus and Themistocles, as Plutarch writeth; others say as much of Hercules, &c.

The honour of Bastards.

Homer. Livy.

The King of Spain descended from Henry de Trastamara, base Son of Alphonfus the Justicer, King of Castile. And who doth not honour the Princely Race of William the Conquerour, Bastard Son to the Duke of Normandy? Where was a more Heroical Man than Robert Earl of Gloucester, base Son of King Henry I.? The Earls of Warren descended from Hamelin, a base Son of Geoffry Plantagenet, Earl of Anjou: The Noble Herberts are also said to come from a base Son of Henry the First.

And the Duke and Earls of Somerset (which followed the red Rose) were the Offspring of the Beauforts, Natural Sons of John de Gaunt.

For a further Conjecture, why these Howards must be descended from Hewardus or Herewardus (for so some Writers call him; but Ingulfus, who best knew him, constantly calls him Hewardus) both Names may signifie in the Saxon old Dutch, a Chief Captain of an Army, whom the Romans call'd Imperator) And that the Titles and Names of great Offices have given Sir-names to many Noble Families, we have Examples in plenty; Particularly, the Viscounts of Milan, the Chamberlaines of Normandy, the Stewards of Scotland, the Butlers of Ireland, and divers others, who had their Sir-names from the Offices of their Ancestors and Fathers; and the same Presumption or Argument may be for taking the Sir-name of Howard, and the Origine of their Family from Hewardus, the Howards from the time of Heward, dwelling in these Countries of Holland and Marshland, and were Lords of some Lands belonging to him, until by their Matches, with the Daughters and Heirs of Fitton, Tendring, Mowbray, Tillney, &c. they became possessed in Norfolk, Suffolk, and Berkshire, and were Lords sometime of Sunning-bill near Windsor, and bore the Sir-name ever since (or with small interruption) the old Sir-name written Heward, or Hereward in Charters and Records, and Howard in Stories. But descend we thro' the Succession of those times to William Haward, Chief Justice in the Reign of Edward I. Grandfather to Sir John Howard, Admiral of the North Fleet, in the Naval Wars of Edward III; his Son Sir Robert Howard married the Daughter of the 1485. the Lord Scales, and Sir John Howard (who liv'd in the time of Henry IV. and died Anno 16. Henry VI.) had two Wives, Margaret Daughter and Heir of Sir John Plais Knight, by whom he had Eliza: an only Daughter, married to John de Vere Earl of Oxford, who brought him a goodly part of the Howards Lands: Her Heirs were married to Latimer and Winckfield, very fruitful Families. His second Wife was the Daughter and Heir of Sir William Tendering of Stoke-Nayland in Suffolk, by whom he had Sir Robert Howard his eldest Son, who married Margaret Mowbray, Daughter of a Cadet of the House of Lancaster, who became Co-heir with her Sister the Lady Berkeley, Wife to Thomas Mowbray Duke of Norfolk, dead in Venice, and left his Son Henry Howard Heir to Howard and Mowbray; and John Howard, the Son of John Howard, was created Earl of Norfolk by King Richard III. in the right of his Mother Mowbray, he married the Daughter of the Lord Moulins, and by her had Thomas Howard, the first Howard Earl of Surrey; this is he who survived the Danger of Bosworth Field, and became afterwards Duke of Norfolk, from whom all the Howards now living are Descended, whose Family hath been so fruitful to furnish this Kingdom with four Dukes, many Earls, Viscounts, and Barons, three High Treasurers, six High or Great Marshals, ten High Admirals, with some Honourable Custos of the Privy-Seal, and sundry Chamberlains of the King's House; and one lately lived who had born the Offices of High Constable, Lord Lieutenant, Lord high Steward, Marshal and Admiral of England, Lord Chief Justice in Oyer of the better Part of this Kingdom, and Chamberlain of the Royal House, a Man honourable in his Departments, and fortunate in his Undertakings; as at the great Marine Battels against all the Naval Powers of Spain, the Pope, and Princes of Italy, Anno Dom. 1588. and in the Siege of Gadys, An. Dom. 1596.

Sir Charles Howard.

Camden in Oed.

And this is the Grand-Child of that Thomas Lord Howard, who for his better Distinction and perpetual Honour is stiled Triumphator Scotorum.

I have stray'd into this Digression, as a grateful Tender of an Acknowledgment I owe to that Illustrious Family, for their Noble Patronage and Favour to my Ancestors, especially to that Unfortunate Bucke and his Children, who wither'd with the white Rose, (bearing an Ancient and Hereditary love to the House of York, and stood in good Credit and Favour with the King his Master) nor let this Remembrance of him, and his obscur'd Family, seem Ostentation or Vain-glory, whilst I say no more than what other Histories dictate; which give him an able Character. Master Camden Clarentius (in his Immortal Britannia,) deriveth this Sir John Bucke, from Sir Walter de Bucke of Brabant and Flanders, who had that Sir-name of great Antiquity from the Castle de Bucke in Lisle, a City and Frontier Town in Flanders, where the ancient Earls were accustomed much to reside; the Ruins of this Castle remained in the late time of Lodwice Guicciardine, who saith, He saw the Carcass thereof: And this Walter Bucke was a Cadet of the House of Flanders, employ'd and sent by the Prince (then Duke of Brabant and Earl of Flanders) to King John, with Auxiliary Troops: Roger Wondover saith, Walter Bucke, Gerard de Scottigni, and Godescalius, venerunt in Angliam cum tribus legionibus Flandrensiū & Brabantianorum militum, &c. and he did the King excellent Service here (as many of our Historians report, for which the King bountifully rewarded him with Lands in Yorkshire and Northamptonshire: 1485. And in Yorkshire (where he made his Seat) he found an ancient Family of the Sirname of Bucke of Buckton, in the Wapentake of Bucroffe, where that Family had anciently been, (for the Name is a Saxon or Dutch word, and signifieth a Beech Tree, or Beech Wood) here Walter contracted Alliance, and married Ralph de Bucke his Eldest Son, to the Daughter and Heir of Gocelinus de Bucke, Grandchild to Radolphus de Bucke, who was a Part Founder and Benefactor to the Abbey of Bredlington, (as is mention'd in the Charter of Henry I. made for the Foundation of that Monastery) and from this Walter descended John Bucke Knight, who married a Strelley, and was so constant in his Affection, that (altho' she died in his best Age) he made a Religious Vow, and became a Knight of the Rhodes, his Arms are yet to be seen in the Ruins of the Hospital of St. John's near Smithfield, and in the Church of Alballows at the Upper-end of Lumbard-street, which was repair'd and enlarg'd with the Stones brought from that demolish'd Canoby: He liv'd sub rege Edvardo filio Regis Henrici: as I have seen by the Date of his Deed in Hertbill, Anno 1 Ed. 1. & Anno 22 Ed. 1.

From this Knight of the Rhodes descended Sir John Bucke, who for his too much forwardness in Charging a Fleet of Spaniards (without the Leave of the Earl of Arundel Lord Admiral) was committed to the Tower, (testified by the Records there) Anno 13. Richard II. Lawrence Bucke his Son, follow'd Edward Plantagenet Duke of York, and was at the Battel of Agincourt with him, when he was Slain: John Bucke Knight, the Son of this Lawrence, married a Daughter and Heir of the House of Starvelly, out of which are descended the Barons Parres of Kendall and Rosse, Queen Katharine (the last Wife of King Henry VIII.) the Lord Parre Marquess of Northampton, and the Herberts Earls of Pembroke and Montgomery.

These Buckes residing for the most part at West-Stanton, and Hertbill in Yorkshire, and match'd into the Families of Strelley or Stirely of Woodball, Thorpe, Tilney, (then of Lincolnshire) and Savill, by which we have much noble Kindred; Sir John Bucke for his Service to the House of York, especially at Bosworth, lost his Head at Leicester; He married the Daughter of Henry Savill, by whom he had Robert Bucke and other Children, who were brought into the Southern Parts by Thomas Duke of Norfolk, where they have remain'd ever since; for the Children (being Orphans) were left in miserable Estate by the Attainder of their Father; But the Duke bestow'd two Daughters in Marriage, one with the Heir of Bucke, the other, with the Heir of Fitz-Lewis, very ancient Families, from which Matches divers Honourable and Noble Persons are descended. The Sons were, one a Souldier, the other a Courtier, the third, a Priest; afterward the Duke bestow'd Robert Bucke, the Eldest Son at Melford-Hall in Suffolk, and married him into the Families of Higbam and Cotton, as also did the Blounds of Elwaston, the Talbots of Grafion, from whom the Barons of Monjoy, and the late Earls of Shrewsbury descended; one of the Daughters of this Bucke married to Frederick Tilney of Shelley-Hall in Suffolk, his nearest Kinsman by the Dutcheffs his Mothers side.) But some perhaps must call this my Vanity, I shall but answer them, that I think my self bound (by all the Blood and Memory I claim from them,) to pay them my best Relations and Endeavours, acknowledging with the great Consular Philosopher, Parentes charissimos habere debemus, quod ab

And I should think there is none, who hath an interest in the quality of Gentile or Noble, (for all is one) but looks back (with some delight) to their first Commemoration; and finds a strong Engagement due to the Vertues and Worth of their first Fathers; for that express Charge to Honour Father and Mother, is not to be understood, only of our Parents superstit, and living here with us, but our Forefathers: that is, beyond our great Grandfather, for we have no proper word for them above that degree (but Antecessors, vu'go Ancestors) whom the Romans called Majores, and comprehendeth all our Progenitors departed sooner or later) for the Words Pater and Mater, as also, Patres & Parentes, extend very largely, and reach up to the highest Ancestors. The ancient Roman Jurisconsults, deliver in their Law for an Axiom, that Appellatione Parentum omnes in infinitum majores utriusque sexus significantur; and the word Parentes yet spreadeth further, comprehending all Kinsfolks and Cousins, of our Blood and Linage, being used in that sense by Aelius Lampridius, by Julius Capitolinus, and other the best Writers in the Times of the declined Empire, as Isaac Casaubonus hath well observed in his Annotations. 1485.

The Italians, Spanish and French, (whose Language is for the most part Romanzi (Mongrel Latin) and broken and corrupted Roman Language (use Parenti, Parentes and Parents for all their Kinsfolks and Gentilitious Cousins.

We Englishmen (being more precise) follow the Ancient and Classick Latin Writers, holding Parent strictly to the simple Signification of Pater and Mater, the present and immediate Parents. But the using of the word Parentes, as those Imperial Historians use it; serveth better for our purpose here: And I could (most willingly) imitate the Pious Gentlemen of Italy, Spain, and France, in their Religious and Charitable Endeavours, to advance the Happiness of their Parents defunct, if those Desires could besteed them. But where I should crave Pardon, I become more Guilty and Extravagant; it is time therefore to know good Manners, and return home to our proper Task, which will be to re-fell the gross and black Calumnies thrown unjustly upon the Memory and Person of King Richard, And falls within the Circle of the next Book.

Erasmus in Chiliad. THERE is no Story that shews the Planetary Affections and Malice of the Vulgar more truly than K. Richard's: and what a tickle game Kings have to play with them; tho' his Successor Henry VII. play'd his providently enough (with help of the Standers by) yet even those Times (which had promised the happiest Example of a State, and best of a King) both groan'd and complain'd; but had not the sting and infection of King Richard's Adversaries, who did not only as the Proverb saith, cum larvis luctare, contend with his immortal Parts, but raked his Dust, to find and aggravate Exceptions in his Grave; having learnt their Piety from the Co-Terentius mical Parasite, obsequium amicos, veritas odium in Adelphi, and finding it as well guerdonable as grateful, to Publish their Libels and Scandalous Pamphlets, (a piece of Policy and Service too) to the Times, (and an offence to resent any thing good of him) they gave their Pens more Gall and freedom, having a Copy set by Doctor Morton, who had taken his Revenge that way, and written a * Book in Latin against King Richard, which came afterward to the Hands of Mr. Moore (sometime his Servant) so that here the Saying of Darius, (which after became a Proverb) hath place

*He wrote many Poems and Epigrams, sundry pretty Comedies, and Entertainments, often times personating with the Actors, as his loving and familiar Friend Erasmus reports. Brixius Antimore.

Dr. Morton (acting the Part of Histicus) made the Book, and Master Moore like Aristagoras set it forth, amplifying and glossing it, with a purpose to have writ the full Story of Richard the Third (as he intimateth in the Title of his Book;) but it should seem he found the Work so melancholy and uncharitable, as dull'd his disposition to it; for he began it, 1513. when he was Under-Sheriff, or Clerk to one of the Sheriffs of London, and had the Intermission of Twenty two Years (which time he took up in Studies, more Natural to his Inclination, as Law and Poetry, * for in them lay his greatest fancy) to finish it before he died, (which was in 1535. but did not yet lift himself so happily into the Opinion of Men, that his Commendations had more Fortune than Observation :) and past him under the Attributes of Learning and Religion; tho' in both he came short of what was ascribed to him; for if he understood the Latin and Greek, (then held great Learning) yet was he so far under the desert of an excellent Scholar, as the learned censured him a Man of slender Reading, and Germanus Brixius, Irruditus, i. unlearned; for the Sanctity of his Life, John Balau, who took not up his Knowledge of him an Age off, (as some of his Admirers,) but from the Original, thus gives us his Draught.

Joan. Balau de scriptoribus Brit. Cent. 8. cap. 69.

Hoc nos probe novimus qui eramus eidem Thomæ Moro viciniore, quod pontificum, & phariseorum crudelitati ex avaritia subserviens omni tyranno truculentior ferociebat, imo insaniebat in eos qui aut Papæ primatum, aut purgatorium, aut mortuorum invocationes, aut imaginum cultus aut simile quiddam diabolicarum imposturarum negabant, a vivifica Dei veritate ita edocti. Consentire hic Harpagus noluit ut Rex Christianus in suo Regno primus esset, nec quod ei liceret cum Davide, Salomone, Josaphato, Ezechia, & Josia Sacerdotes, & Levitas rejicere Romanensium Nembrodorum tyrannide in proprio ordinare dominio, &c.

In English thus.

" This we, who were no Strangers to the said Thomas More, very well know, that, for covetous Ends ministering to the Cruelty of the Priests and Pharisees, he raged more fiercely than any Tyrant; yea, was transported even to Madnes against those, who instructed by the Life-giving Truth of God, denied either the Supremacy of the Pope, or Purgatory, or the Worshipping of Saints or Images, or such other diabolical Impostures. This Man of Avarice would not agree that a Christian King should be Supreme in his own Kingdom, nor permit him with David, Solomon, Jehoshaphat, Ezechiah, and Josias, rejecting the Tyranny of the Roman Nimrods, to order the Priests and Levites in his own Dominions, &c.

Rich. Graf-ton saith, he died mocking and scoffing as he lived.

Adding the Attribute of tenebrio, of veritatis evangelicæ perversissimus osor, of obstinatus Calophanta, of impudens Christi adversarius; and saith of his end that decollatus fuit in Turri Londinensi sexto die Julii, Anno Dom. 1535. Capite ad magnum Londini pontem (ut proditoribus fieri solet) stipiti imposto, & nihilominus a Papistis pro novo Martyre colitur.

That is, " He was Beheaded in the Tower of London upon the Sixth day of July, in the Year 1535. his Head, (as is usual to be done

" with Traytors,) being fix'd on a Pole upon the Bridge of London; notwithstanding of which he is by the Papists adored for a new Martyr.

Thus he became a Martyr and a Saint; but we shall find other Cause of his Condemnation by his own Testimony; for when he stood at the Bar arraigned, some Exceptions having been urg'd against him, for seeming to uphold and maintain the Pope's Supremacy in England; his Reply was, he could not see quomodo laicus vel secularis homo possit vel debeat esse caput status spiritualis aut ecclesiastici; yet insinuated, that this Opinion was taken hold of but for a Pretext to supplant him; the greatest cause of the King's Displeasure being for his withstanding the Divorce, between him and Katharine of Castile his Wife, and his second Marriage with the Lady Anne Bullen Marquesset of Pembroke: And his own words (spoken to the Judges, as they were set down by his dear Friend, George Courinus, in a short Discourse upon his Death) are, non me pudet quamobrem a vobis condemnatus sum (videlicet) ob id, quod nunquam voluerim assentiri in negotium novi matrimonii Regis, which uttered after Sentence of Condemnation, (when no Evasion or Subterfuges would avail) must proceed surely from his Conscience; and before this, he wrote a Letter to Mr. Secretary Cromwell, (which I have seen) wherein he protested, he was not against the King, either for his second Marriage, or for the Churches Supremacy: But wisheth him good Success in those Affairs, &c. which renders him (well look'd upon) not so stout a Champion for the Pope, as many of his partial Friends and Romanists supposed; Neither so found in his Religion; for I have seen amongst the multitude of Writings, concerning the Conference about the Alteration of Religion, and suppressing of Churches and religious Houses, that his Connivance and Consent was in it; nor could he excuse it, with all his Policy and Wisdom, neither had the K. ever attempted it, had not the Pope and his Agents opposed that second Marriage, an Error and Insolency Rome hath ever since repented. But it prov'd a happy blow of Justice to this Kingdom, cutting off him and his Authority, which else had hazarded the best Queen that ever was, the Sacred and eternally honour'd Elizabeth, to whose growing Glory and Virtue Mr. Moore became an early and cruel Adversary, even before she was in rerum natura. To know him further, let me refer you to the Ecclesiastical History of Mr. John Fox, in the Reign of Henry VIII. who describes him Graphically; for his Historical Fragment, it shews what great Pains he took to item the Faults and sad Fortunes of King Richard III. and how Industrious he was to be a Time-observer, it being the most plausible Theme his Poetical Strain could fall on in those Times, and could not want Acceptance nor Credit, well-knowing in what Fame he stood, and that the weaker Annalists and Chroniclers, (of mean Learning and less Judgment) would boldly take it upon trust from his Pen; who tantum ignotum & servum pecus, have follow'd him step by step without Consideration, or just Examination of their Occurrents and Consequents. And the Reputation of him and Dr. Morton (being both Lord Chancellors of England) might easily mislead men part blind, who have dealt with King Richard, as some trivial clawing Pamphleters, and Historical Parasites, with the magnificent Prelate Thomas Wolsey Cardinal and Archbishop of York, a man of

But so much Gall and Envy is thrown upon King Richard's Story, as cannot possibly fall into the Style of an ingenuous and charitable Pen; all his Virtue is by a malicious Alchymy substracted into Crimes, and where they necessarily fall into mention, either scornfully transmitted or perverted, with injurious Constructions, not allowing him the Resemblance of Goodness or Merit: If his Disposition be Affable and Curteous, (as generally it was, which their own Relations cannot deny) then he insinuates and dives into the Peoples Hearts: so where he expresses the Bounty and Magnificence of his Mind, it is a subtle Trick to purchase Friendship; let him conceal the Knowledge of his Injuries, and his Patience is deep Hypocrisie; for his Mercy and Clemency extended to the highest Offenders, (as to Fogge the Attorney, who had made a Libel against him, besides the Counterfeiting of his Hand and Seal) they were but palliated, and his Friendship merely a Court Brow. They have yet a more captious and subtle Calumny, reproaching the Casting of his Eyes, Motions of his Fingers, Manner of his Gesture, and his other natural Actions.

I confess with Cicero that status, incessus, sessio, occubatio, vultus, oculi, manuum motio, have a certain kind of Decorum; but he makes it not a Vice to erre in any of them, nor that any Error committed in them was a Vice; altho' in him it must be so defined by the Laws of Utopia: Nay, they will dissect his very Sleeps, to find Prodigious Dreams and Bug-bears, (Accidents frequent to themselves) which they dress in all the Fright and Horror Fiction and the Stage can add, who would have sung Peans to his Glory, had his Sword brought Victory from Bosworth Field: But now, their Envy is born with him from his Mother's Womb, and delivers him into the World with a Strange prodigy of Teeth; altho' (I am perswaded) neither Dr. Morton, nor Sir Thomas Moore ever spake with the Dutche's his Mother, or her Midwife, about the matter.

But if true; it importeth no reason why those early and natalitious Teeth should preface such Horror and Guilt to his Birth; when we shall remember those many Noble and Worthy Men who have had the like, (without any imputation of Crime) as * Marcus Curius Sirnam'd there-upon Dentatus, Cu. Papiene, King of the Epirots (a Prince much renown'd for his Victories and Virtues) Monodas Son of Prusias King of Bithynia, born with an intire Semicircular Bone in their Mouths, instead of Teeth: then they aggravate the Pangs of the Dutche's in her Travail with him: which had not been sufferable without Death, if so extream and intolerable, as they would have them thought for,

Quod ferri potest leve est; quod non, breve est.

What can be born is light; what cannot, short.

But she overcame them and lived almost Fifty Years after; others have died in that Bed, yet the Children not made Guilty of Murther; Julia the Daughter of Julius Caesar, Wife to great Pompey, Juliola the dear Daughter of Marcus Cicero, Wife of Dolabella, and Junia Claudilla the Empress, and Wife of Caligula, died all of the Difficulties and Extremity of their Child-bearing; so did Q. Elizabeth Wife of King Henry VII. and since the Mother of that most towardly and hopeful Prince Edward VI. in travail of his Birth; with many Thousands more, whose Deaths (much less their Pains) were never imputed to their Children.

The next Objection is somewhat of more regard, (but as far without the certainty of a Proof) which is the pretended Deformity of his Body, controverted by many; some peremptorily asserted he was not deformed, of which Opinion was John Stow, a Man indifferently inquisitive (as in all their other Affairs) after the verbal Relations and Persons of Princes, and curious in his Description of their Features and Lineaments, who in all his Inquiry could find no such Note of Deformity in this King: but hath acknowledged viva voce, that he had spoken with some ancient Men, who from their own Sight and Knowledge affirmed he was of bodily Shape comely enough, only of low Stature, which is all the Deformity they proportion so monstrously; neither did John Ronce who knew him, and writ much in his Description, observe any other: And Archibald Quaitlaw, Ambassador unto this King from Scotland, in his Oration says, he had corpus exiguum; not otherwise; so (to my conceit) Philip de Comines and the Prior of Croyland (who had seen and known this Prince) seem to clear him implicatively; for in all their Discourses of him, they never directly nor indirectly, covertly or apertly, insinuate this Deformity which (I suppose) they would not have passed: And by his sundry Pictures which I have seen, there was no such Disproportion in his Person or Lineaments, but all decently compacted to his Stature, his Face of a warlike Aspect, (which Sir Tho. Moore Rot. in an. calleth a crabbed Visage) of all the Children being said to be most like his Father in favour and composition of Shape, who tho' not tall was of an even and well-disposed Structure.

And Sir Thomas Moore himself, doth not certainly affirm the Deformity, but rather seems to take it as a Malitious Report; for, saith he, King Richard was deformed as the Fame ran by those that hated him; habemus reum confitentem, and surely it had been a strange kind of Confidence and Reason in Dr. Shaw, || to disclaim a thing which must be so palpable, openly in the

† Sir Thomas More describes him thus: He was little of Stature, ill-featur'd of Limbs, Crook-back'd, his Left Shoulder much higher than his Right, hard favour'd of Visage, the Dutche's, his Mother, had so much ado in her Travel, that she cou'd not be Deliver'd of him uncut; he came into the World with his Feet forward, and not Untoother'd.

Holinhead's Description of him is much the same: He was small and little of Stature of Body greatly deform'd, the one Shoulder higher than the other; His Face was small but his Countenance Cruel, and such as at the first aspect a Man wou'd judge it to favour and smell of Malice, Fraud and Deceit.

|| Mr. Burk cannot avoid erring; there is no mention even in Dr. Shaw's Speech of King Richard's being like his Father in the Body, 'tis said in the Face only. His Words were, "The very Noble Prince, the Special Pattern of Knightly Prowess, as well in all Princely Behaviour as in the Lineaments and Favour of his Visage, representing the very Face of the Noble Duke of York, his Father. Hol. p. 728. Sir Thomas Moore writes, That the People instead of Applauding this Harangue, stood amaz'd at the Preacher, who for more Shame hid himself, and not long after pin'd away to Death. Hist. of Edw. V. and Rich. III.

Socrates, A Sophus, Epictetus, Galba a great and excellent Captain of the Romans, all of deformed Stature. Now, what can Malice extract out of this, to upbraid or stigmatize his Honour; if Men of blemish'd Persons may contain a Wise, Valiant, Learned, Liberal and Religious Soul, and be in every Part most absolute, exampled to us in many famous Men; and at our Home (as well in this present Age as in the more ancient) we have had Men of a harsh Fabrick, most nobly furnish'd in the Composures of their Minds.

But because these Cavils could not fetch Blood from him, they will make him guilty of other Men, and first of King Henry VI. whose Murther they say (and very favourably) his Brother Edward contrived, but wrought him to act it; an Accusation of very harsh Credit, that either King Edward, so truly noble and valiant a Prince, should put a Prince and his own Brother, upon so horrid a Thing, or he endure to hear it. Sir Thomas Moore holds King Edward would not engage his Brother in so butcherly an Office, there being many Reasons that he durst not, neither do his Adversaries charge him directly by any credible Author of that Time, † or discover by whom this Murther was; only the Prior of Croyland maketh it somewhat suspicious.

Chron. Croyland. Hoc tempore inventum est corpus regis Henrici sexti exanime in turre Londinaria. Parcat Deus, & spatium penitentiae ei donet quicumque sacrilegas manus in Christum Domini ausus immittere, unde & agens tyranni & patiens gloriosi martyris titulum mereantur.

That is, "At this Time the Body of King "Henry VI. was found Dead in the Tower of "London. May God spare, and give time of "Repentance to him, who hath dared to lay "Sacriligious Hands upon the Lord's Anointed, "whence the Actor hath merited the Title of "a Tyrant, as the Sufferer that of a Glorious "Martyr.

Tyrannus in the proper Construction, being Rex, for whosoever is Rex is Tyrannus, according to the ancient Signification; for amongst the Greeks Τύραννος was used for a King simply, good or bad, and this (some hold) makes against King Edward; Richard being Duke of Gloucester then, yet so doubtfully as may be refuted by good Authority; for it is the Opinion of very grave Men, Henry VI. was not murder'd, but died of natural Sickness, and extreme Infirmary of Body.

Idem Croyland. Rex Henricus sextus, ab annis jam multis ex accidente sibi agitudine quandam animi incurreret infirmitatem, & sic ager corpore & impos mentis permansit diutius; i. e. "King Henry VI. for many Years, by reason of a Sickness which had befallen him, had contracted a certain Weakness of Mind, and so remain'd for a long time both diseased in Body and distempered in Mind. This consider'd with the Aggravation of his Grief and Sorrow, || in the loss of his Crown and Liberty (being then a Prisoner) the Overthrow of all his Friends and Forces in the Battel of Tewkesbury, but (above all) the Death of his Son the Prince, might master a stronger Heart and Constitution than his, in a shorter time; which Opinion is receiv'd and alledged by a learned and discreet Gentleman.

The occasion of the Murther of King Henry VI. hath no other Proof but the malicious Affirmation of one Man; for many other Men more truly did suppose that he died of mere Grief and Melancholy, when he heard the Overthrow of his Cause and Friends, with the Slaughter of the Prince his Son: And Johannes Majerus saith it was reported, King Henry VI. died of Grief and Thought. Concerning the Slaughter of the Prince his only Son, it is noted to be casual, and made sudden by his own Insolence, not out of any pretended Malice or premeditated Treachery, and so it cannot be called Wilful Murther; for the King demanding him why he invaded his Kingdom, his Reply was, he might, and ought to do it, in defence and preservation of the Right, which the King his Father and his Heirs had in the Crown; and maintain'd this lofty Answer so peremptorily and boldly, the King in rage struck him with his Fist, (as some say armed with a Gantlet) and instantly the Noblemen attending, as George Polidor, Duke of Clarence, Marquess Dorset, the Lord Hastings and others, drew their Swords upon the Prince and killed him; which they would make the particular fact of Duke Richard.

But to the contrary, I have seen in a faithful Manuscript Chronicle of those times, † That the Duke of Gloucester only of all the great Persons, stood still and drew not his Sword; the Reasons to credit this are, first it might be in his mere Sense of Honour, seeing so many drawn upon him, there was no need of his, or in his respects to the Prince's Wife, who (as Johannes Anna, uxor Majerus saith) was in the Room and near a-kin to the Dutches of York his Mother, and to whom the Duke was also very Affectionate, (tho' secretly) which he soon after demonstrated in marrying her; nay, this Duke bore such a Sense of noble Actions in his Bosom, that misliking the obscure and mean Burial of Henry VI. this Prince's Father, he caus'd his Corps to be taken from Chertsey, and to be honourably convey'd to the Royal and Stately Chappel of Windsor, ordain'd for Kings.

And Sir Thomas Moore saith further, He was suspected to have the contriving Part in the Duke of Clarence his Brother's Death, yet confesseth it was commonly said Richard oppos'd himself against the Unnatural Proceedings of the King, both privately and publickly; and the truth is, it was the King's own immovable and inexorable Doom who thought it justly and necessarily his due; for Clarence stood Guilty of many Treasons and great ones, and by † Edward Hall writes, "Richard Duke of Gloucester as the constant Fame ran, (to the intent that his Brother King Edward might reign with more Surety) murder'd King Henry with a Dagger.

Sir Thomas Moore, "He slew with his own Hand King Henry VI. being Prisoner in the Tower, as was constantly said, without Commandment or Knowledge of the King. Ibid.

The Lord Bacon, speaking of the Ignominy offer'd his Corps at Leicester, "No Man thought it unworthy Him who had been the Executioner of King Hen. VI. that Innocent Prince with his own Hand. Reign of Hen. VI.

|| This, says Holinshead, is recorded by some Persons altogether favouring the House of York.

* The Lord Bacon says, He was the Contriver of the Death of the Duke of Clarence his Brother.

1485. his Ingratitude had so forfeited himself to the King's Displeasure, that no Friend durst move in his Behalf; this the King did afterward acknowledge with some Discontent, when his Wrath had cooled, as we may guess in this Expression of his: O infatigabilem fratrem, pro cuius salute nemo homo rogavit; yet Polidor Virgil doth not rightly understand here as I conjecture by the Sequel; but let us interpret that a little, and take up another Accusation which puts into the way.

Polidor.
Virgil.

That Richard Duke of Gloucester should scandal the Birth of the King his Brother with Bastardy, and alledge it for a special Matter in Dr. Shaw's Sermon, that he should fame King Edward IV. a Bastard, and that the Dutches, his Mother had wanton familiarity with a certain Gentleman; this he might erroneously scatter in the Pulpit, and take it upon the like Intelligence, by which (in the same Sermon) he call'd her (to whom King Edward was betrothed before his Marriage with the Lady Grey) Elizabeth Lucy, whose Name was for a certain Ellenor Butler alias Talbot, so call'd by King Richard, and written in the Records.

Dr. Shaw.

That the Duke of Gloucester raised not the slander against the Dutches's his Mother, nor of his Brother's Bastardy.

This Drift had been too gross for King Richard, to lay an Imputation of Whoredom upon his own Mother, (a Virtuous and Honourable Lady) being it cast also a Shame and Bastardy upon himself; for if she offended in one, she might as likely offend in another, and in the rest.

And to quit him of it, Sir Thomas Moore, Richard Grafton, Mr. Hall, say that King Richard was much displeased with the Doctor, when he heard the Relation, which the Duke of Buckingham also affirmed in his Speech to the Lord Mayor of London. That Dr. Shaw had incur'd the great displeasure of the Protector for speaking so dishonourably of the Dutches's Mother.

That he was able of his own knowledge to say, he had done wrong to the Protector therein, who was ever known to bear a reverend and filial Love unto her: and to cut off all farther Doubt and Question, it was proved and is testified upon Records that George Duke of Clarence only rais'd this Slander in an extreme Hatred to the King his Brother, (many Jarrs falling between them) by which the King had a just cause to take notice of his Malice.

Vixit est dux Clarentia magis, ac magis a regis presentia se subtrahere, in consilio vix verbum proferre, neque libenter bibere aut manducare in domo Regis, i. e. "The Duke of Clarence was observed more and more to withdraw himself from the Presence and Conversation of the King, to keep Silence in the Council, scarcely uttering one Word, and willingly neither to Eat nor Drink in the King's House.

When Richard even in that calamitous Time Henry VI. had overthrown King Edward in a Battel, recover'd the Kingdom, and proclaim'd Edward an Usurper; so faithful was his Brother, that (a) he was proclaim'd Traitor for him; and (b) when Queen Margaret besieg'd the City of Gloucester with the King's Power, the Citizens stood at defiance with her Army, and told her it was the Duke of Gloucester's Town, who was with the King, and for the King, and for him they would hold it; his Loyalty bearing a most constant expression in this Motto (c) Lou-alto me lie; which I have seen written by his own Hand and Subscribed, Richard Gloucester. The other was as constantly undermining at him, after confederated with the Earl of Warwick his Father Allie, who had turn'd Faith from the King, and went into France, soliciting for Force against England; which they brought in, fought with the King and overthrew him, and so fiercely pursuing the Victory, that the King was forc'd to fly out of the Land: Clarence not so satisfied, (unless he might utterly supplant him) studied that Slander of Bastardy, to bring in himself an Heir to the Crown, which was proved and given in expresse Evidence against him, at his Trial and Attainder by Parliament, amongst sundry other Articles of High Treason.

Videlicet, That the said Duke of Clarence had in Parliament, untruly Publish'd King Edward a Bastard and not Legitimate to reign, that himself therefore was true Heir of the Kingdom, the Royalty and Crown belonging unto him, and to his Heirs; these be the very words of the Record, and enough to tell us who was the Author of that Slander, and what important Cause the King had to quit himself of Clarence: a bitter Proof of the old Proverb, fratrum inter se ira acerbissima sunt; and all the Favour Clarence could at his end obtain, was to choose it, (as John de Serres reporteth it) so that it was not the Duke of Gloucester, but the King's implacable Displeasure for his Malice and Treasons that cut him off, who could not think himself secure whilst he liv'd: Witness Polidor Virgil, Edwardus Rex post mortem fratris se a cunctis timeri animadvertit, & ipse jam timebat neminem.

That is, "King Edward the Sixth after his Brother's Death, perceiv'd that he was feared by all, and himself now feared no Man.

Next, for the Murther of the two Sons of Who King Edward IV. King in hope, and made a way the Richard of Shrewsbury Duke of York and Norfolk Sons of K. his younger Brother, they alledge it in this manner. Edw. the Fourth.

That King Richard, being desirous to rid those two Princes his Nephews out of the World; imploy'd his trusty Servant John Green to Sir Robert Rrackenbury Lieutenant-Constable of the Tower, about the executing of this Murther; and by reason that Plot took no effect, (Sir Robert not liking it) the Protector suborn'd Four desperate Villains, John Dighton, Miles Forrest, James Tyrrell, and William Slater to undertake it, who, (as they further alledge) smother'd them in their Beds; which done, they made a deep Hole in the Ground, at the foot of the Stairs of their Lodging, and there buried them, hiding the place under an heap of Stones (not after the ancient manner of tumulus testis). Others vary from this, and say confidently, the Young Princes were Imbarked in a Ship at Tower-Wharff, and convey'd from thence to Sea, so cast into the Black Deepes; others aver they were not Drown'd, but set safe on Shore beyond Seas. And thus their Stories and Relations are scatter'd in various Forms, their Accusations differing in very many and material Points, which shakes the Credit of their Suggestion, and makes it both fabulous and uncertain, one giving the Lye to the other, their Malice having too much Tongue for their Memories, and is worth the noting how opposite (and as it were) ex Diametro repugnant they are.

In vulgus fama valuit filios Edwardi Regis ali- quod terrarum partem migrasse, atque ita superstitibus esse. Polidor Virgil, l. 2. 6.

Thus Polidor, with which Dr. Morton and Sir Thomas Moore agree in one place: The Man (say they) commonly called Perkin Warbeck was as well with the Princes as with the People, English and Foreign, held to be the younger Son of Edward IV. and that the Deaths of the young King Edward and of Richard his Brother, had come 1485. come so far in question, as some are yet in doubt whether they were destroy'd or no, in the days of King Richard; By which it appears they were thought to be living after his Death. And as the act of their Death is thus uncertainly disputed, so is the manner of it controverted.

For Sir Thomas Moore affirmeth (as before reported) they were smother'd in their Beds with Pillows; but Pellidor saith peremptorily it was never known of what kind of Death they dy'd.

Another Author, and more Ancient, agreeth with them.

Prior Croyland. Vulgatum est Regis Edwardi pueros concessisse in fata, sed quo genere interitus ignoratur; one reason of this may be that they who held Perkin Warbeck and Richard Duke of York to be all one, 1485. give another Account of his Death, whereas if it had been certain these four before named for Affassines had murder'd them, then the Place, Time and Manner had been easily known upon their strict Examination, they living freely and securely, (and without question) long after this Murder was said to be done. * Therefore there can be no Excuse for this Neglect of Examination, much less for the suffering such to go unpunish'd and at liberty, which methinks maketh much for the clearing of King Richard.

As for the burying of their Bodies in the Tower, if that be brought in Question, certes, the Affirmative will be much more hard to prove than the Negative.

* Sir James Tyrrell when he had murder'd the two Young Princes, rode in great hast to King Richard, and shew'd him all the manner of the Murther. The King gave him great Thanks, and as some say, Knighted him. Sir Tho. More's Hist. Edw. V. and Rich. III.

The Lord Bacon affirms of King Richard, "He was the Murderer of his two Nephews (One of them his Lawful King in the Present, and the Other in the Future failing of him.) Hen. VII.

Habington in his History of Edward IV. p. 229. writes, "His two Sons were Inhumanely murder'd, and as obscurely Buried.

† The Truth of this Burial of the Princes is now past Dispute; since the Bones of them have of late Years been found. For when, in the time of Chichester Master of the Ordinance, great heaps of Records of Bills and Answers lying in the Six Clerks Office were removed thence, to be reposit in the White Tower, and a new Pair of Stairs were making into the Chappel there, for the easier Conveyance of them thither, the Labourers in digging at the foot of the old Stairs came to the Bones of consumed Corps, cover'd with an heap of Stones; the Proportion of the Bones being answerable to the Ages of these two Royal Youths. The News of this Discovery, being brought to K. Charles II. he was so well satisfy'd that these must be those Princes Bones, that he caused them to be translated, and decently and honourably interred in Henry the Seventh's Chappel among their Royal Ancestors, the Kings and Princes of this Land. And this Discovery that Time hath made, makes it very probable, that the bloody Part of this commonly received History is true. They are reposit near two other Royal Children, Mary and Sophia the Daughters of King James I. And the Monument for them made of white Marble hath this Inscription in Capital Letters, Viz.

And it adds a great Suspicion to K. Richard's Guilt of these Princes Bloods, that after the Queen Dowager had delivered her Son Duke Richard out of her own Custody, she still kept the Sanctuary in the Abby with her Daughters; and that for many Months after his Usurpation of the Crown. For there she was in the Month of March, which was Eight Months after, and could not as yet be perswaded to leave the Place. Which must needs be out of the Fear and Dread she had of K. Richard, and of some further Mischiefe to befall her and the rest of her Family. He in the mean time, thinking her Abiding here, might continue odious Reflections upon him from the People, laboured all he could to remove her thence. Inasmuch that for her better Confidence and Satisfaction, I find in an Original Journal wherein the Transactions of his Reign are entred, that he solemnly Swore upon the Gospels, before an Assembly of Lords Spiritual and Temporal (as it seems in Parliament time) the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London present, That if she would come from Sanctuary, she should be provided for by an Honourable Allowance; and that her Daughters should have no harm done to their Persons, nor be put into the Tower, but that he would marry them to Gentlemen. And further he caused all this to be drawn up in a Form in perpetuum rei Memoriam: Which was to this Tenor;

"Memorandum, That I Richard by the Grace of God, King of England and of Fraunce, and Lord of Irland, in the presence of you my Lordes Spirituell and Temporell, and the Major and Aldermen of my Cite of London, promitte and Iwere verbo Regis, upon these holy Evangelies of God by me personelly touched, that if the Doughters of Dame Elizabeth Gray late calling her self Quene of England, that is to wit, Elizabeth, Cecil, Anne, Kaserin, and Briggis, wold come unto me out of the Sanctuarie of Westminster, and be guyded, ruled and demeaned after me; than I shal see that they shal be in Suertie of their Lyffes; and also not suffre any maner hurt by any maner persone or persones to them or any of them, in their Bodies and Persones, to be done, by wey of Ravishment or defouling, contrarie to their Willes. Nor them, or any of them, emprisoned within the Toure of London, or other prisonne; but that I shal put them in honest places of good name and fame, and them honestly and curtesly shal see to be founden and entreated; and to have al thynges requisite and necessary for their exhibicion, and findinges, as my kynneswomen: And that I shal do marie suche of them as now ben mariable to Gentilmen borne, and everiche of them geve in mariage, Landes and Tenements, to the yerely valewe of CC Mark for terme of their Lyves; and in likewise to the other doughters, when they come to lawful age of Mariage, if they lyff. And suche Gentilmen as shal happen to marie with them, I shal straitly charge from tyme to tyme lovyngly to love and entreate them as their Wiffes and my Kynneswomen, as they wold advoid and eschue my displeasur. And over this, that I shal yerely from hensfurth content and pay, or cause to be contented and paid, for the Exhibicion and finding of the same Dame Elizabeth Gray, during her natural liffe, at four termes of the Yere, that is to wit, at Pasche, Midsummer, Mickelmesse, and Christenmesse, to John Nesfelde, one of the Squieres for my body, for his finding to attend upon her, the Summe of DCC Mark of Lawful Money of England, by even porcions.

"And moreover I promitte to them, that if any surmyse or evyl report be made to me of them, or any of them, by any persone or persones, that than I shal not geve therunto faith ne credence, nor therefore put them to any maner punishment, before that they, or any of them, so accused may be at their lawful Defence and answer. In witnesse whereof to this Writing of my Othe and Promise aforesaid, in their said Presences made, I have set my Signe Manuel, the first Day of March the first Yere of my Reigne.

It may also be taken notice of what extraordinary Gratifications the King granted to Tyrrel, that common History reporteth to be the great Deviser, Procurer and Manager of this bloody Bulinefs, and to Brackenbury the Lieutenant of the Tower that was to conceal it. To this later were given the Manors of Mote Merden, Desling and Newenton, of Cramborne, and Cokered, and other Lands in Romney Marsh; all the Lands and Tenements in the County of Kent, and elsewhere, lately belonging to the Earl Rivers, the Chenies, and Walter Roberts, of the value of 117 l. 11 s. 4 d. And also the Manor of Mawdelyn near Berkhamsted in Bucks; And the Manor of Glassenbury, value 22 l. 5 s. 3 d. The King 1485. King appointed him also Receiver, for his Truth, Sadness and Discretion (as the Letters ran) of the King's Issues, Profits and Revenues of his Lordships of Middleton and Merden in Kent. He had also, with the Constableness of the Tower, the Office of Master and Operator of the Monies, and Keeper of the Exchange within the Tower during his Life. He had also the Keeping of the Lions, with the Fees.

Sir James Tyrrel who was Knight of the King's Body, had the Office of Steward of the Lordships of Lanemiberry, Lanthefant, Newport, Wenloke, and Keveorb Merilith in Wales, and the Marches, for the term of Life; with the Wages, Fees, &c. accustomed, and to make Officers under him: He was also Chief Governor of Glamorganshire. He had also granted him (with one Richard Gold) the Ward and Marriage of Rob. Arundel Trevisse, Son and Heir of John Arundel Trevisse, Esq; with the Keeping of the Lands, Tenements and Manors, &c. during his Minority. He appointed him the Rule and guiding of the Castle of Guifnes: to have and occupy the said Charge during Pleasure, and in the Absence of the L. Mountjoy Lieutenant there. And a Commission was made to the Lieutenant, Coroner, Knights, Esquires and other Officers of the Shires of Glamorgan and Morgannok; to accept the same Sir James as their Governor and Leader, as he had been heretofore, notwithstanding the King sent him to Guifnes: and they to be ready with Horses and Harness and Money, for Men to attend upon his Deputies, to do the King's Service, when they should be called. This was dated in January, Anno 2do. The King also sent him to Flanders for divers Matters concerning greatly the King's Weal. As the King thus gratified him with Gifts, and honoured him with Places and Offices of Trust, so he kept him as much at a distance as he could. He put him in great Trust in Wales against the Duke of Buckingham, and the Disturbances there. Richard Vinors Esq; the Chamberlain of Carmarthen, had order to content him Wages for Seventy Soldiers, being of Sir James's Retinue; that is, to each after the Rate of 6 d. a Day: And to pay him 100 Mark Sterling, which he spent in the King's Service at his late being in those Parts by the King's Commandment. And lastly, I find him one of the Commissioners, with the Earl of Huntington, Morgan, Kidwelly, and others, to enter into all the Castles of the Principality of Wales, Earldom of March, and Dukedom of Buckingham, and other Traitors, in North and South Wales, and the Marches, and to seize all the said Traitors Goods and Castles. And a certain Livelihood in the Counties of Devon and Cornwal, being in Travers and Controversy, between Sir James Tyrrel and Sir Tho. Arundel; who being now a Traitor, the King sends to Sir Piers S. Alhyn, committing unto him full Power and Authority to seize and enter upon the said Livelihood and Appurtinences, to the use and behalf of the said Sir James his full trusty Knight.

John Grene, one of the Yeomen of the King's Chamber, commonly said to be the King's Messenger to Tyrrel, to recommend this black Work to him, was made Receiver of the Lordship of the Isle of Wight, and of the Castle and Lordship of Portchester.

John Dighton, Tyrrel's Horse-Keeper, that is said actually to assist at the Smothering of the Princes, had, by the King's Gift, the Bailiwick of Aiton in the County of Stafford, with the Wages accustomed, during his Life.

Further, it is a Circumstance that makes this King look like an Usurper, and one that came wrongfully to the Crown, that he was jealous of the Affection and Obedience of the People. Which appears in his altering the common Form of the Oath of Fealty: and in the room thereof requiring the Oath to be taken in these Words, Viz.

"I A. become true and feithful Liegeman unto my Sovereign Lord Richard the Third by the Grace of God King of England, &c. and to his Heirs Kings of England, and to him and them my feith and trouth shal bere during my liif natural; and with him and in his cause and quarrel. at al times shal take his part, and be redy to leve and dy ayenst al earthly creatures; and utterly endeavour me to the resistance and suppressing of his Enemies, Rebels and Traitors, if I shal any know, to the uttermost of my Power; and nothing concele that in any wise may be hurting to his noble and royal Person. So God me help and these holy Evangelies. J. S.

For true it is, there was much diligent Search made for their Bodies in the Tower: All places open'd and digg'd that was suppos'd, but not found. Then it was given out a certain Priest took up their Bodies and buried them in another Secret place not to be found; hereunto (but with better Decorum for the more Credit of this Assertion) they might have added it was done sub sigillo confessionis, which may not be revealed.

Sir Thomas Moore, seeing the Absurdities and Contrarieties of these Opinions, (as a Man puzzled and distracted with the Variety and Uncertainty thereof) concludeth their Bodies were bestow'd God wot where, and that it could never come to light what became of them; † Hall, Hollingshed, Grafton and the rest, confess, the very Truth hereof was never known: And (if there be a strict Inquiry into the Mystery) we shall discover, that they were neither buried in the Tower nor swallow'd in the Sea; for the Testimony and Relation of sundry grave and discreet Persons (and such as knew the young Duke of York) will resolve us how he was preserved and secretly convey'd into a foreign Country; also alive many Years after the Time of this Imaginary Murder; to which may be added strong Authorities having laid down some Conjectures that may Answer the Inquiry after the other. And first, whereas it is said the Lord Protector before his Coronation procur'd this Murder; to refel and contradict that, there be certain Proofs, that the Princes were both living in the Month of February following the Death of their Father, which was ten Months after; for King Edward died in April before, and this is plain in the Records of the Parliament of Anno 1 Rich. 3. where there is mention made of this Prince, as then living; and Sir Thomas Moore confesseth that they were living long after that time before said; But I conjecture Edward the eldest Brother liv'd not long after, but di'd of Sickness and Infirmary, being of a weak and sickly Disposition, as also was his Brother, which the Queen their Mother intimated in her Speech to the Cardinal Bourchier; and the weak Constitutions and short Lives of their Sisters may be a natural Proof to infer it probable enough this Prince died in the Tower; which some Men of these Times are the rather brought to think, certain Bones like to the Bones of a Child being found lately in a high desolate Turret, supposed to be the Bones of one of these Princes; Others are of Opinion it was the Carcass of an Ape kept in the Tower, that in his old Age had happen'd into that place to die in, and having clamber'd up thither, according to the light and idle manner of those wanton Animals, after when he would have gone down, seeing the Way to be steep and the Precipice so terrible, durst not adventure to descend, but for fear stay'd and starv'd himself; and although he might be soon mis'd and long sought for, yet was not easily to be found; that Turret being reckon'd a vast and damn'd place for the height and hard access, nobody in many Years looking into it.

But it is of no great Consequence to our purpose, whether it were the Carcass of a Child or of an Ape, or whether this young Prince died in the Tower or no; for wheresoever he died, why should it not be as probable he died of a natural Sickness and Infirmary, as for his young Cousin-german the Son and Heir of King Richard? many Reasons conducing why the qualities and kind of their Death might be the same, and near one Time, being even Parallels

1485. almost, and in their Humane Constitutions and Corporal Habitude sympathizing, of one Linage and Family, of one Blood and Age, of the same Quality and Fortune; therefore not unlikely of the same Studies, Affections, Passions, Distemperatures, so consequently subject to the same Infirmities, to which may be added equal and common Constellations, the same compa-tient and commoriant Fates and Times, and then there is Reason and Natural Cause they might both Die of like Diseases and Infirmary, and were not Bradenford, taken away by Violence, Secret, or Overt: For it may with as much Argument be suspected the Son of King Richard, (being in the like Danger of secret Violence for the same Cause as his Cousin was) might suffer so.

But to open the Circumstance a little nearer; What Danger could the Lives of those two Princes be to Richard? who was accepted King by a just Title, and his Nephews declared Illegitimate by the High Court of Parliament, and whilst they were reputed such by so Great and General a Conclusion, why should he be less Secure of them, than Henry II. was of Robert E. of Gloucester, base Son to Henry I.? or Richard I. of his base Brother Geoffrey Plantagenet? So although John of Gaunt left base Sons, aspiring enough, yet they were of no Danger to the Lancastrian Kings; neither did Henry VII. or Henry VIII. stand in any Jealousie of Arthur Plantagenet: And surely Richard III. was as Valiant, Wife and Confident as any of his Predecessors, and had as little Cause to dread his Nephews, as they stood adjudged, or be more Cruel and Bloody; neither hath my Reading found any Bastards of France or Spain, who have aspired so publicly, only except Don Enrique E. of Trastamara, who was drawn into that Action by the violent Rages of the People, and by the Persuasions of the revolted States of Castile, to put down a Monster of Sovereignty the hateful and cruel Tyrant Don Pedro. But being Sir Thomas Moore and our best Chroniclers make it doubtful, whether these two Princes were so lost in King Richard's Time, or no, and infer that one of them was thought to be living many Years after his Death, that might be enough to acquit him; which Opinion I like the better, because it mentioneth the Survivance but of one of them.

Neither do our most credible Stories mention the Transportation of more than one into Flanders, nor had they reason; it will be sufficient if one of them survived him, more or less time: We will follow therefore the Examination of his Story, under the Opinion of those Times, and the Attestation of grave and credible Men, because it will be more conspicuous in the true and simple Narration of this one Brother; every Story being fraught with Reports concerning him, and few or none of his Brother, finding no mention of the Elder Brother's being in Flanders; but of the Younger's much, and of his other Adventures: The Prudent and Honorable Care of sending away his younger Brother, by some is ascribed to Sir Robert Brakenbury, by others to the Queen his Mother, and it may well be the Projection of them both, tho' no doubt there was the Advice and Assent of other well-affected Friends. And it is the more credible, the Queen wrought in it; for the Story of Sir Thomas Moore saith, she was before 1485. suspected to have had such a Purpose, which was objected to her by some of the Lords; and the Cardinal Bourchier told her the main Reason which made the Protector and Nobles so urging to have him sent to his Brother (being then in the Tower) was a Suspicion and Fear they had she would convey him forth of the Realm.

So then, it may be clearly suppos'd he was sent into a foreign Country, and that Flanders (as all our Stories testify), there commended to a liberal Education, under the Curature of a worthy Gentleman in Warbeck, a Town in Flanders, but kept very privately all the Life-time of his Uncle, his Friends not daring to make him of the Counsel. After his Death, knowing Henry Richmond a cruel Enemy to the House of York, for his better Safety was committed to the Care of † Charles of Burgundy, and his Dutcheſs the Lady Margaret Aunt to the Prince, as formerly the Dutcheſs of York, upon a like Cause of Fear and Jealousy had sent thither her two younger Sons George and Richard.

The Dutcheſs being very tender to let this young Duke have all Princely and Vertuous Education in Torney in Antwerp, and after in the Court of the Duke of Burgundy, as he had been in Warbeck, &c. And with the greater Circumspection, because the Dutcheſs of Burgundy had as jealous an Opinion of Henry VII. as the Queen Widow had of Richard III. Therefore, as yet, it was advised to conceal his Name and Quality: being not come to the Growth nor Age to have Experience in his own Affairs, much less to undertake an Attempt so Consequent and Mighty as the Recovery of a Kingdom: Neither were the Times and Opportunity yet ripe or propitious, to fashion such an Alteration as was projected and must be produced, tho' there was pregnant Hope of an Induction to a Change of Government stirr'd by the King's Covetousness and some Acts of Tyranny, Grievance and Rebellions in the North and West Parts; not long after (which lent a seasonable Hand to these Designs) great Unkindness fell out betwixt Charles the French King and Henry VII. who so far provok'd the French, that he besieg'd Bulloign with a great Army by Land and Sea, the Quarrel was of good Advancement to the Dutcheſs of Burgundy's Plot, and brought the Duke of York better acquainted with foreign Princes and their Courts; who was sent into France, into Portugal, and other Places, where he was receiv'd and entertain'd like a Prince.

In which time such of the English Nobility as were interested in the Secret, and knew where this Prince resided, found some Opportunity to give him Assistance; and sent Sir Robert Clifford and Sir William Barley into Flanders, to give him a Visit and Intelligence of what Noble Friends he had ready to Serve him: tho' their more particular Errand was, to take a strict Observance of him, and such private Marks as he had been known by from his Cradle: there had been some Counterfeits, encouraged to take upon them the Persons of Edward E. of Warwick, and Richard Duke of York: But here the certainty of their Knowledge found him they look'd for, by his Face, Countenance, Lineaments and all Tokens familiarly and privately known to them; observing his Behaviour, naturaliz'd and heightened with a Princely grace, and in his Dis-

1485. course able to give them a ready Account of many Passages he had heard or seen whilst he was in England; with such things as had been done and discoursed very privately, speaking English very perfectly, and better than the Dutch or Wallonish: By which Sir Robert Clifford and the rest, found themselves so well satisfied, and were so well confirm'd, that they wrote to the Lord Fitzwater, to Sir Simon Mountford, and others (who had a good Opinion towards him) the full account of what they had observ'd ex certa scientia, & supra visum corporis. About this time (to intermix the Scene with more Variety, and fill the Stage) some principal Persons, well affecting the Earl of Warwick, and hoping to get him forth of the Tower, (in purpose to make him King) had enticed a handsome young Fellow, one Lambert Simnel of Lancashire, bred in the University of Oxford to become his Counterfeit, and so instructed him in the Royal Genealogy, that he was able to say as he was taught; maintain'd and abetted, chiefly, by the Viscount Lovel, the Earl of Lincoln, Sir Thomas Broughton, and Sir Simon Preiss, &c. who being presented to the Duke and Dutches of Burgundy, and by them honourably entertain'd, drew to him in Flanders, one Martin Swartz, a Captain of very eminent Fame, and some Forces, with which he made over into Ireland, where they receiv'd him as Edward Earl of Warwick, as he was of many here at home: And when the Deceit was discover'd, the Excuse was, Those Lords but used this Counterfeit of the Earl for a Colour, whilst they could get him out of the Tower to make him King. But the Veil is easily taken from the Face of such Impostors, Examples giving us light in many; for tho' some Men may, all cannot be deceiv'd: So Pseudo-Agrippa in the Time of Tiberius, was soon found to be Clemens the Servant of Agrippa, tho' very like to him; and Pseudo-Nero in Otho's Time, who took upon him to be Nero reviv'd, was quickly unmask'd.

Dion, Tacitus, Suetonius. Counterfeit Princes.

Its written by the old Historians that King Harold was not slain at the Battel of Hastings by the Conquerors; but that he survived and went to Jerusalem, &c. But it not importeth whether he were the true Harold or Pseudo-Harold; because he never came to claim any thing in England.

Valerius Paterculus telleth of a certain ambitious Counterfeit in Macedonia, who call'd himself Philip, and would be reputed the next Heir of the Crown, but was discover'd and Nicknam'd Pseudo-Philippus: Also in the Reign of Commodus One pretended to be Sextus Claudianus, the Son of Maximus; with many such that are obvious in old Stories; and many of the like stamp have been here convicted in England; which bred the greater Jealousy of this Richard, when he came first to be heard of; tho' those Jealousies proceeded not from the detection of any Fraud in him, but of the late Imposture of the said Lambert, the Shoemaker's Son, and the Abuse of the Complotters; for the Kingdom having been abused with those Pseudo-Claresces, had reason to be doubtful of every unknown Person which assumed the name of Greatness; in regard whereof, many shrunk in their Opinions from this Perkin, or Richard; many others suspecting their Belief, were very curious to inform themselves, who the further they enquired, were the more confirm'd, that he was no other but the second Son of Edward IV. against whom, those of the harder Credulity, objected it as an Impossibility, that this young Duke could be convey'd out of the Tower, so long, and so conceal'd; which the wiser sort could easily answer by many ancient Examples, which give us divers Relations of Noble Children preserv'd more admirably. And this young Duke himself, in his own behalf, when such Objections were made against him, did alledge to James King of Scotland, the History of Joab, mention'd in the Book of the Kings, and that most special one of Moses:

Which the Dutches his Aunt, Sister German to his Father, was strongly confirm'd in, giving him all answerable and honourable Accommodation; so did the chief Nobility of those Parts, and as an Heir of the House of York, there was render'd him the Title of La-Rose-Blanch, the proper and ancient Device of the House of York; withal, a gallant guard of Souldiers was allowed him for Attendance, and much was he favour'd by the Arch-Duke Maximilian, King of the Romans, by Philip his Son Duke of Burgundy, Charles the French King, the King of Portugal and Scotland, by the chiefest of Ireland, and many Personages in England, who at extreme Peril and Hazard, avow'd him to be the second Son of Edward IV.

The Princes aforementioned, readily supplying him with Coin and Assistance towards his Achievements. King Henry actively apprehends what it threatned, and bestirs himself to take off their Inclinations, dispatching Dr. William Warham (after Archbishop of Canterbury) with Sir Edward Poynings, a grave and worthy Knight, to under-rate his Credit with those Princes; and such strong Perswasions were used, that Philip Duke of Burgundy (for his Father Maximilian was before return'd into Austria) utterly declines himself and his Subjects from his first Engagement, but excepted the Widow Dutches of Burgundy, over whom he had no Power of Command, because she had all Justice and Jurisdiction in those large Signiories, whereof her Dowry was compos'd.

And thus Richard was supplanted here; what hope of Aid he had, or did expect by his Voyage into Portugal, I cannot say, tho' his Entertainment there was honourable: But by reason of the distance of the Country, it may be thought he was to build little upon any from thence, his chief Confidence and Refuge being in England and Ireland, where he had a good Party, and sail'd with a pretty Fleet into Ireland; there he was welcom'd and receiv'd as the second Son of King Edward; some of the Geraldins and other Great Lords in Ireland, purposing to make him their King: To overtake him betimes there too, Dr. Henry Deane, Abbot of Lanthory (a very wise able Man) was sent and made Chancellor of Ireland; with him went the said Sir Edw. Poynings, who so actively bestir'd themselves, that in short time they drew the Irish from Perkin, so that now he must return Home; but by the Way, was encouraged to apply himself to James King of Scotland, whither forthwith he directs his Hopes, and found his Entertainment answerable to them; the King receiving him very nobly by his Title of Duke of York, calls him Cozen, with Promises to give him strong Footing in England, and (in earnest of his better Intents) bestow'd in Marriage upon him the most noble and fair Lady Katherine Gordon his near Kinswoman, Daughter of Alexander Earl of Huntly. This came home very sharply to King Henry, who knew King James to be a Prince so wise and valiant, that no easy Delusion cou'd abuse him.

And true it is, King James was very precise in his Consideration of this young Duke; but very clearly confirm'd before he would acknowledge him. King Henry is very studious how to thwart the Event of this Scene and unfasten the King, but casts his Confidence again upon the fortune of his Judgment, and sends many Protestations, with rich Promises to King James for Perkin (for so we shall now call him with the Times) which took small effect at first; but King Henry (being a Man pregnant to find any Advantage, and One whose Providence would

At that time too, it happen'd so happily, there was a Treaty and Intelligence betwixt Henry VII. and Ferdinando, for proposition of a Marriage of Arthur the Prince of Wales and Katharine Daughter of King Ferdinando. This Occasion no sooner offer'd it self to his Consideration, but a Post was dispatch'd to Castile, with Letters and Instructions, to give the King to know what had pass'd between him and King James of Scotland, urging him to use the Power and Credit he had with him, for the Delivery of Perkin to himself: Which Ferdinando undertook, and sends Don Pedro Ayala (not one Peter Hialas, or Peter Hayles) as our vulgar Stories have (a wise and learned Man, and of a very Noble House) who so ably used his Brain in this Employment, that King James pass'd to him his Promise, to dismiss Perkin to his own Fortunes, but would by no means deliver him to the King.

Hall in H.

Thus Perkin was again supplanted Virtute vel dolo, and of necessity driven into Ireland, where he was formerly receiv'd and entertain'd; Whilst they were agitating their first Plot of setting him King, Charles the French King sends to him Lois de Laques and Estienne Friant to offer him his Friendship and Aid: With this good News Perkin hasten'd into France, where he found his Welcome very honourable, as befitting a Prince, a Guard appointed to attend him, of which Monseigneur Congre-Salle was Captain. Before this King Henry had threatned France with an Army, but now upon a better View and Deliberation, foreseeing what this had in it, he propounds very fair Conditions for a Peace with the French King, which the French King was willing to entertain, and so it was concluded. Perkin after this began to think the King shorten'd his Respects, and look'd upon him (as it were) but Imagine lusca, with half a Countenance; and fearing there might be some Capitulation in this new League, that might concern his Liberty, privately quits Paris, returning to his Aunt of Burgundy. Altho' Perkin was thus shorten'd in his Foreign Expectations, he had those both in England and Ireland, that much favour'd him and his Cause, making another Voyage into Ireland, but return'd with his first Comfort; for though they stood constantly affected and were willing, the King's Officers curb'd them so, they could not stir.

From Ireland he sail'd into England, landing at Bodmin in Cornwall, the Cornish and Western Men thereabouts receiving him very gladly, proclaiming him King of England and of France, &c. by the Title of Richard the Fourth (as he had been proclaim'd before in the North Parts of England, by the Council and Countenance of the King of Scots). Out of Cornwall he marches into Devonshire to Exeter, to which he laid Siege, having then about 5000 Men in his Army; but the King's being at hand and far stronger, he was forc'd to rise from the Siege; upon which those few Friends he had left (finding his Want, and the King with greater Strength approaching) forsook him to provide for themselves. Thus abandon'd, no way before him but Flight, and being well mounted, with a Train of some Forty or Fifty resolute Gentlemen, recovers the Abbey of Beaulieu in Hampshire, where he took Sanctuary, from which the King's Party who pursued him, would violently have surpris'd him; Which the Abbot and Religious Persons would not indure as a thing too foul against their Priviledge. The King after sends to him

Proffers of Favours and Mercy, with Promises of such Honour and Condition as drew him to the Court, where the King look'd upon him with a very gracious and bountiful Usage as a Noble Person: But his prompting Jealousies and Fears soon cast a dulness over this first Favours and Promises; then a Guard must be set upon Perkin and his usual Freedom restrain'd: These were harsh Prefages (he thought) which so justly mov'd his Suspicion and Discontent that he thought Sanctuary again must be his best Safety, and passing by the Monastery of Sbrene, he suddenly slips into it from his Guard, whither the King sends unto him with Perswasions of the first courtly and honourable Tincture; but Perkin that had discern'd the Hook, was not easily to be tempted with the Bait this second time.

Then the King dealt with the Prior for him, who would not yield him, but upon faithful promise from the King to use him with all Favour and Grace, which was protested, although Perkin no sooner came into his Power again but he was sent to the Tower, where his Imprisonment was made so hard and rude, that it much dejected and troubled him, oftentimes in private and with peircing Groans, having been heard to wish himself born the Son of any Peasant; and indeed, every one could tell he far'd the worse for his Name, it being an Observation of those Times, that there was Three Men most fear'd of the King, Edward Plantagenet Earl of Warwick, Perkin, alias Richard Plantagenet, and Edmond de la Poole, Son of King Edward's Sister, all of the Family of York, but most of all Perkin, being of a more active Spirit, so more sensible of his Wrongs than the other, and cost the King more Consultation and Treasure in the working him into his Hands; therefore answerably aggravated his Miseries and Disgraces which now began to exceed; for he was not only sharply restrain'd in the Tower, but the Fame was the Question or * Gebenne was given him: † Sometimes he was taken forth and carried in most ignominious manner abroad to be set in the Pillory, otherwhile in the Stocks; after all these bitter and cruel Punishments (to pull down his Stomach) there was sent some unto him of purpose to perswade his Submission to the King's Mercy; and by renouncing his Blood, Birth and Title, to confess himself no other but Perkin Warbeck, the Son of a base Flemming; which he scorn'd and denying, his Sufferings were made more rigorous, and he lodg'd poorly and basely, as meanly fed, worse clad, until at length by Torments and Extremities he was forc'd to say any thing, and content to unsay what they would have him, to accuse himself by a forc'd Recantation of his Family, Name, and Royal Parentage; this must be compell'd too under his Hand, then to be brought by the Officers unto the most publick Places of London and Westminster, to suffer as before related, and with a loud Voice to read the same, which might pass at present with the Multitude for current, who knew not how it was forced from him; nor had Judgment enough to know and consider, that Racks and Tortures have made very able Men accuse themselves and others unjustly. Seneca telleth of a Man who being suspected of Theft, was enforced by Torture to confess the Theft and his Fellow Theives; but having none, he accused the good and just Cato, to avoid the Torture; nay, (which is a thing of more horror) it maketh Men by false Oaths to blaspheme God; therefore St. Augustine inveigheth sharply against the cruel Use of it, and amongst many other Sins which he findeth in it, this is one,

The tortured gladly doing this the sooner to exchange those Torments with Death, as the far less Pain.

And therefore this young Man may be excusable in what he did against himself, his Youth being ignorant of these high Points of Honour, and could not yet be confirm'd in any brave and firm Resolution, nor happily in Religion, and the worse also by the reason of his long Imprisonment and heavy Trouble, having no Counsel to strengthen him, nor so much as in Charity to comfort him, but left a miserable desperate forlorn Man, and fear'd to be so for ever, and at the best. And if learned grave Men, Men of Grace, having large Talents of Spirit and Science, for fear of such Punishments, have denied some chief Points of Christian Faith, yet have been excused for the Torture sake, (of which we have testimony in Ecclesiastical Stories) what may a tender and unexperienc'd Youth do? For which just Causes, the best Doctors of the Civil Law, and also of Theology, condemn and abhor the use of Torture, as having a further Mischief in it, and is Arcanum Gebennæ a secret of Torture or of Hell.

Torture

For when the Prisoner's Body by extreme Torment is brought into any mortal State or Symptom of Death, or made incurable and deadly, then to avoid the Imputation of Murder, the Prisoner by a short and private Process is condemn'd of some capital Crime, and presently executed, whilst there is yet some Life in him; and to that Censure Perkin at last came; for nothing could serve but his Blood, his Confession being only extorted from him to persuade the People he was an Impostor; and because they could not lay hold of his Life by the Course of Law or Justice (being not attainted nor condemn'd of any capital Crime). This Scruple being a little consider'd, there was found out a way to remove that, and Matter enough to make him guilty of a capital Offence: For which purpose it was devised there should a practice of Escape be offer'd him; and because the Case of Edward Plantagenet Earl of Warwick was like unto his, and as well wish'd, being not attainted of any Crime, he also must desire to escape, that Device being the only matter of Guilt or capital Crime which was wanting, and might be (as it were) created for them the more colourably to effect their Executions; there not wanting Instruments for that purpose, to betray their innocent Confidence, whose Imprisonment had lain so heavily and cruelly upon them, that they were easily persuaded to catch at any hope of Liberty.

Some say the Earl of Warwick at his Arraignment was charg'd with persuading the other to make his Escape, but sure it is, they both gladly hearken'd to the Motion of it, and were soon after accused as guilty of Practice and Conspiracy to escape out of the Tower, so for the same arraignment and condemn'd to Die; tho' great difference was put in their Process and Execution; for the Earl of Warwick was try'd by his Noble Peers, and had the Supplice of a Nobleman, in an honourable Place, the Tower of London: Per- kin, alias Richard, by a Common Jury, who are Men (many times) of little Honesty, and to suffer at the common and infamous Place, Tyburn, by the Name of Perkin Warbeck, to confirm the People he was what they condemn'd him for: For his Nick-name was supposed to have utterly disnobled him, and (as it were) divested him of all his Noble Blood and Titles, the Condition of an Impostor serving best for a Cloak against that Purple Shower, which was at the Fall and Cruel Usage of this miserable Prince*.

It may be thought the Earl of Warwick had as shamefully suffer'd, if the Wit and Malice of the Cardinal could have reach'd to have made him a Counterfeit: But all Men knew, he was not only a true and certain Prince, but free from all Practice, (b) yet he was restrain'd of his Liberty, and a Prisoner the most part of his Life, from the time of his Father's Attainder until he suffer'd; this was after they had surviv'd King Richard their Uncle about Fifteen Years.

Now for their Offence, the learned Judges will tell us of what Nature and Quality it is call'd in Law.

Some holding an Escape to be but an Error, The a natural dislike of Bondage, or a Forfeit of Simplicity, proceeding from a natural and very tolerable desire of Liberty, which Opinion is contingent to Right; and the Cause of these two Princes may also be the better receiv'd, if it be well consider'd, that this Plot of their Escape was not projected by themselves, but cunningly propounded to them by proper Instruments (being young and unexperienced) to entangle them in some capital Offence, and so of Death, of which kind of Offences they stood clear before, not once accused, having never been indicted or attainted of any thing Capital. Therefore now their Innocence must be made guilty; and in this I say no more than all our Historians or others say, who agree in one Opinion, That the King could not take away the Lives of Perkin Warbeck and the Earl of Warwick, until this Practice of their Escape was laid to them, and they made guilty thereof. Therefore they were not Traytors before, neither was Perkin now to be thought a Counterfeit, but a Prince of the Blood, claiming the Crown; for otherwise, he was Perkin of Flanders, a base Fellow and a most culpable and notorious Traytor; then what need they look further for a Crime to put him to Death? And if he were not a Traytor, surely it was a Tyranny to make, of an innocent and guiltless Man, a guilty Felon, and by Trains and Acts to forge an Offence out of nothing. For doubtless an innocent and true Man may seek Freedom, and purpose an Act of Escape, also commit it, and yet be still an Honest Man, and a Faithful Good Subject; for Nature and Reason teacheth and alloweth all Men to eschew Injuries and Oppression.

The French word Escape is to seek to be free; and the French Mentranslate Escape into the Latin salvus, Escape what.

Besides this Practice of those Young Men, to escape, was found (as Polidore well observeth) Crimen Alienum, and not Crimen proprium; then how much greater was the wrong, to take away their Lives.

But however it may be laid upon them, it was nothing but a Desire of Liberty out of Durance, in which they were kept for a small, or no Offence.

* He openly read his Confession, and took it upon his Death to be true, that he was an Impostor. Ld. Verulam, Hen. VII. Hollinshead relates, That He and John a Water, Mayor of Cork, took it on their Deaths to be true, what they had confess'd, and ask'd the King's Pardon.

(b) A notorious Falsity; He was Tried for endeavouring to escape with Perkin, and to raise Sedition and destroy the King; to which Indictment he pleaded guilty. Ld. Verulam Hen. VII.

1485. The Civil Law holdeth Suspicion of Flight or Escape to be no Crime. Suspicio fugæ quia, non solet detrimentum, reipublicæ adferre, non censetur crimen; so Ulpian. And by the Laws of England, if a Prisoner do escape, who is not imprison'd for Treason or Felony, but some lesser Fault of Trespas, according to the Old Law of England.

Escapæ non adjudicabitur versus eum, qui Commissus est Prisonæ, pro transgressionē. Escape shall not be adjudged for Felony or other Crime, in one who is committed for Trespas.

For the Offence of the Escape is made in the Common Law, to be of the same Nature and Guilt with the Crime whereof the Prisoner is attainted: And certainly, neither the Earl of Warwick, nor Richard, alias Perkin were attainted of Treason or Felony, &c. before.

But to close this Dispute and Tragedy, not long after, some of the Instruments that betray'd them into this, as Walter Blunt, Thomas Astwood, Servants to the Lieutenant of the Tower, finished at Tiburn, because they should tell no Tales.

And to this succinct Relation, there can be no better Testimony than the Hands of those Witnesses, who have seal'd their Confession and Knowledge with their Bloods: Men of all Conditions and Estates, all maintaining at the last Gasps, that Perkin was the true Duke of York; whose Affirmations I will produce, give me but leave, by the way, to answer one Objection or Cavil brought against this Duke, call'd in scorn Perkin Warbeck. A new Writer affirming him to be an Impostor, whose Learning may be as much mistaken in this as other things, tho' he laid a great pretence to Knowledge, especially in the History of England and other Countries. Indeed his Judgment and Reading are much express'd alike in his Pamphlet, which he calls [The History of Perkin Warbeck,] wherein he forfeits all his Skill, to make him a Parallel in adverse Fortune and supposed base Quality, to the unhappy Don Sebastian late King of Portugal, who he also protests an Impostor. And to arrive at this huge Knowledge, he wou'd have us think, he took much pains in the sifting of Authors; and indeed I think he did sift them, concerning his Ignorance in the Case of Don Sebastian (if he be not too wise to be inform'd) I will urge some Reasons on Don Sebastian's side, who was King of Portugal; and invading the Kingdom of Barbary, Anno Dom. 1584, was overthrown in a fierce and bloody Battel in the Fields of Alcazer, by the King of Morocco, where it was thought he was slain, but escaped and fled secretly travestise or disguised; traveling in that manner through many parts of Africa and Asia some Thirty Years; in which Time and Travel he suffer'd much, liv'd in Captivity and Misery, but at last got away into Europe, with purpose to have got into Portugal (if possible) to repossess the Kingdom.

In his Return he came to Venice, there discover'd himself, and desires aid of the Venetian States: They entertain'd him as a Prince distress'd, gave him Good Words, but durst not lend him Assistance, fearing the King of Spain; yet the chief Senators and many of the wisest of the Signiory made no doubt of him.

Among them Signieur Lorenzo Justiniano of the Senators Order (a Man of wise and great Abilities) was appointed by the States, a Commissioner (with others) to hear and examine this Cause of Don Sebastian, in which they took much pains. And this Signieur Lorenzo (being lieger Ambassador in England) affirm'd and protested solemnly, he and all the other Commissioners were clear and very confident he was Don Sebastian King of Portugal, notwithstanding they durst not give him Aid, but counsel'd him for France, where the King favour'd right, without fear of another's Displeasure. But taking Florence in his way, in the Habit of a Fryer, he was observ'd and discover'd by some Spies which the Grand Duke of Tuscany had set upon him from Venice; who to insinuate with the King of Spain, Philip the Second, and for some other commodious Considerations, deliver'd Sebastian to the Governour of Orbasselli (a Spanish Port in Tuscany) from thence sent him by Sea to the Count De la Mos, Vice-roy of Naples, who convey'd him into Spain: There for a while his Entertainment was no better than in the Gallies: What other Welcome he had I know not, but the same went certainly he was secretly made away after Philip the Third was King. The said Vice-roy of Naples confess'd in secret to a Friend of his, he verily believ'd his Prisoner was the true Sebastian King of Portugal; and was induced to be of that opinion, by the strong Testimonies and many strange and peculiar Marks, which some honourable Portugueses did know him by, all found about the Body of this Sebastian. And the French King Henry IV. it should seem, was perswaded no less: For when the News was told him the Duke of Florence had sent this Sebastian to the King of Spain, he told the Queen what an ill Deed her Uncle had done, in these words, Nostre Uncle a fait un acte fort indigne de sa Personne.

Dr. Stephen de Sampago, in a Letter to Joseph Texere, Counsellor and Almoner to the most Christian King, writes thus, "The King, Don Sebastian, is here in Venice, &c. So soon as he arriv'd here (where he hoped to find support) the Ambassador of Castile persecuted him very cruelly, perswading the Signiory that he was a Calabrou, &c. I swear to your Fatherhood, By the Passion of Jesus Christ, this Man is truly the King Don Sebastian; he hath all the Marks on his Body, without failing in any one, as he had in his Infancy, only the Wounds excepted, which he receiv'd in that Battel of Africk; he gives the reason of his Life, and account of all his Passages, &c. He is known and re-known by the Conciergres, by the Judges, by the greater part of the Senate, and by his own Confessor, &c. and a great deal more of him upon Knowledge he justifies: As much witnesses John de Castro Son to Don De Alvaro de Castro, one of the Four Governours that ruled the Kingdom conjunctly with the King Don Sebastian, who in his Letter to the same Man says thus; "The King Don Sebastian (whom the Enemies call a Calabrou) is the very same which is detain'd here, as certainly as you are Fryer Joseph, and my self Don John. He departed alive from the Battel, but very fore wounded; GOD having so delivered him with some other of his Company, amongst whom was the Duke Anegro, &c. As for the Exterior Marks of his Body he wants not one of them; he is wounded on the Brow of the Right Eye, and on the Head, as many witness'd when they saw him in the Africk Battel: His Hand-writing is still the same, observing the very same Method, as is very well remembred by divers.

There might be much more instanced in the behalf of this Sebastian, but this may serve for better Intelligence; to whom I may add, That Men experienced in the Affairs and Policy of State, know it a rare thing to find in any History, 1485. story, the Examples of a Prince, being seiz'd and possess'd of any Signiory or Principality (how unlawfully soever) who hath resign'd them, or any part to the true Heirs. Have we not Instances at Home, where the Son hath taken the Kingdom from the Father, and would not let it go again, but rather endeavour'd to haste his Father's Fate? Much after that manner, when Henry Duke of Lancaster had got the Kingdom, he held it and would not resign to the Right Heir Richard the Second, nor after his Death to the Earl of March, tho' these were no Impostors, neither was Edward Earl of Warwick; yet King Henry would not let his Hold go: And the Cardinal Favourite, finding he could not compass his Aims one way, contrived it another. By the Machiavilian Advice he gave to Ferdinand K. of Castile, not to conclude the Treaty of the Marriage between Prince Arthur and his Daughter Katharine, until this Earl and Perkin were disposed of, which Ferdinando follow'd and urg'd the King, pretending it the Security of his Estate and Issue. In brief, it is not possible to perswade a Private Man, tho' wrongfully possess'd to acknowledge the true Proprietary hath a better Title than he.

How unjustly have the Kings of Spain detain'd sundry Signiories and Principalities from the lawful Heirs? Yet if the Wrong done by such another dissembling Lord, be put to this former Usurper, Mala fide (as the Imperial Juriconsults will term him) his Sentence will be, Such a rapinuous Prince doth wrong.

But let us now take a more particular View of those Witnesses who stood for Perkin. And having formerly mention'd Sir Robert Clifford, a Knight of the Noble Family of the Barons Cliffords, I will proceed with that which may be the more remarkable in him, because he was of a Family that long hated the House of York, from the Battel of Wakefield, when and where they resolv'd an Enmity so deadly, as was not to be reconciled or satisfied whilst one of them remained; yet became Followers again of the White Rose Family; and this Robert Clifford served King Edward very near, and in good Credit, so could not but have an assured Knowledge of the King's Sons, and was therefore the more particularly sent to certify his Knowledge; who certainly affirm'd him to be the younger Son of Edward IV. and confirm'd many with him; such as had likewise served King Edward, and had been acquainted with the Prince's conveying beyond Sea, though much was done to alter Sir Robert's Opinion. The Lord Fitz-Walter was of the same Belief, and avow'd Perkin the true D. of York most constantly unto Death: As resolute was Sir William Stanley, though he were Ld. Chamberlain to Henry VII. and in great favour; with Sir George Nevill, Brother to the Earl of Westmorland, Sir Simon Mountford, Sir William Daubeny, Father to the Lord Daubeny, Sir Thomas Thwaites, Sir Robert Ratcliffe of the House of the Baron Fitz-Walter, Sir John Taylor, Sir Thomas Chaloner, Thomas Bagnal, with many other Gentlemen of Quality, all maintaining him to be the Duke of York, Son of Edward the Fourth, and sundry of the Clergy, who had been Chaplains to the King his Father, or otherwise occasion'd to attend the Court, as Dr. Rochford, Dr. Poyner, Dr. Sutton, Dr. Worsley Dean of St. Paul's, Dr. Leyborn, Dr. Lefty, with many other learned Professors of Divinity, who would not endure to hear him call'd Perkin. The Lord Fitz-Walter, Sir William Stanley, Sir Simon Mountford, Sir Robert Ratcliffe, Sir William Daubeny (as Martyrs of State) confirm'd their Testimony with their

There were some Great Men (tho' they made no profession of their Knowledge of him) could whisper it one to another, which in general words is confess'd by all our better Writers; who say, That as well the Noblemen, as others, held the said Perkin to be the younger Son of K. Edward the Fourth.

And Sir Thomas Moor, after Dr. Morton, thus writeth; The Man, commonly call'd Perkin Warbeck, was as well with the Prince, as with the People, held to be the younger Son of K. Edward the Fourth.

Richard Grafton affirmeth the same; In Flanders (saith he) and most of all here in England, it was receiv'd for an undoubted Truth, not only of the People, but of the Nobles, that Perkin was the Son of King Edward the Fourth: And they all swore and affirmed this to be true. The learned and famous Mr. Cambden averreth, There were many wise, grave, and Persons of good Intelligence, (who lived in that Time and near it) that affirmed confidently, This Perkin was Second Son to King Edward: Then both the Brothers were not made away by King Richard; and surely it was little Reason or Policy, to cut off the One and spare the other; neither indeed was there ever any Proofs made by Testimony, Argument, or Presumption, nor by Reason, Honour, or Policy, that this Crime could be his, tho' many to the contrary; for he not only preserv'd his Nephew, the young Earl of Warwick, but in his Confidence (a special Note of his Magnanimity) gave him Liberty, Pleasure, and the Command of a stately House of his own.

Now if he had been so ambitious and bloody, he would have provided otherwise for him, knowing his Title was to take Place, if his Blood had not been attainted in his Father; in regard whereof, K. Richard, when his own Son was dead, caused his Nephew John de la Poole, eldest Son of the Duke of Suffolk, and of the Dutches's his Sister, (then the next lawful Heir to the Crown) to be proclaim'd Heir apparent; an Argument of Respect to his Kindred and next Title to the Crown, in whomsoever it was; which other Men regarded not so much as the unhappy Sequel shew'd; and there was an impious Necessity in that, for whilst the Prince of York surviv'd, (especially the Males) no other Titular Lord, or Pretender, could be King by his own Right, or by colour of Right, nor by any other Means, unless he had married a Daughter, and the eldest Daughter of King Edward the Fourth.

And altho' the Deaths and Manner of taking away these Princes (the Sons of King Edward) is held, by our Writers, uncertain and obscure, it is manifest (at least for the general Manner of their Death) to be either by the Publick Sword, that is, the Sword of Justice or of Battel, as were King Richard, the Children of the Duke of Clarence and the Duke of Suffolk, &c. or by the Private Sword; that is, by secret and close Slights, Treachery, (which the Romans call'd Infidia dolus) by Smothering, Strangling, Poison, Sorcery, &c. And that the Sword was used against the Family of York, there is more than Publick Sword.

In the Parliament, Anno 1 Richardi Tertii, there was accused and attainted of Sorcery and such other Devilish Practices, Dr. Lewis, Dr. Morton, William Knevit of Buckingham, the Countess of Richmond, Thomas Nandick of Cambridge, Conjurer, with others: There was also an Earl accused of the same Hellish Art; and an old Manuscript Book which I have seen, says, That Dr. Morton and a certain Countess, contriving the Death of King Edward and others, resolv'd it by Poison. Which are Conjectures and Proofs more positive and strong against them, than any they have against King Richard; but it was a great Neglect in their Malice, making King Richard so politick and treacherous as they did, not to charge him also with these Prince's Sisters; for it would not serve his Turn, to rid away the Brothers and not them, who were capable of the Crown, and had their Turn Royal before any Collateral Males. Then he had the Children of his elder Brother George Duke of Clarence, Edward Plantagenet Earl of Warwick, and the Lady Margaret his Sister, after Countess of Salisbury, to make away; for they without their Father's Corruption of Blood (which might easily have been salved by Parliament, the Lords and Commons affecting them) had a Priority of Blood and Precedency of Title before the Protector.

Reasons why King Richard should not destroy his Nephews.

I would ask the Reason too, Why King Richard might not endure his Nephews (being by Parliament held and adjudged Illegitimate) as well as the Kings Henry VII. and Henry VIII. endured Arthur Plantagenet, the Bastard of the same King Edward their Natales and Cases being alike; or why Sir Thomas Moor and Dr. Morton, should in one place say, It was held in doubt, when, or how they were made away; and in another place to aver, That Tyrrel and Dighton, being examin'd, confess'd plainly, the Murder of them and all the Manner of it.

These be Contraries, which with a great Disadvantage, draws their Allegation into another Argument, Bicornes, or Crocodilites: For in revealing the Confession of these Men, it is implicatively granted, their Fault was not then to be punish'd, and so it appears no Fault, or not worth the consideration; the Confession of a Man being the greatest Evidence can be produced against him. Then, in regard the Confession of those was such as might not be open'd, nor the Crime call'd in question (as the same Authors acknowledge) it was but a feign'd Confession, and they had done better not to have mention'd such a thing, which begot but a Jealousy in the Falsity thereof, or privy of some Great Ones in it, and a just imputation of Injustice upon the Magistracy: For if Dighton, Tyrrel, Forest and Slater confess the Murder in Act and Manner, King Richard being dead (who was said to stubborn and protest 'em) necessarily, and in due course of Justice, (especially in the Act of so high a nature and notice as this was) the Punishment should have been expected with all extremity. But being for some unknown Causes deferr'd, and after a while quite omitted and pardon'd, it may be thought such strange Clemency and Impunity proceeded from a singular high Indulgence, or else, those Examinations and Confessions were but Buzzes and quaint Devices to amaze the People, and entertain them with expectation of a Justice, to be done in some more convenient time (which was never). This was after the Death of King Richard: All that was done before, was to make him the Author of that horrible Crime, and no Body else; for Dighton and the rest were in Security and Liberty, yet it stood in good stead with the Lancastrians, to draw the Peoples Hate upon King Richard, not unlike that Story of Great Alexander; and a Noble Man in his Court, who stood so high in the Favour of his Nobles and People, that the King grew jealous and fearful of his Popularity, studying how he might decline it and him to Contempt, but could find no Colour or apt Occasion, because he was so strongly fix'd in the Peoples Liking, and was a Man of so great a Desert that no Crime could be charg'd upon him. The King unbosoming himself to the Counsel and Care of a Friend, one Medius, (of his Country, as I think) had this Advice,

"Sir, (quoth he) Let not this Man's Greatness trouble you, cause him to be accused of some Heinous Crime, (tho' falsely) and we will find Means to make him guilty, so formally and firmly, that the Brand of it shall stick upon him for ever; Which he delivered in these Terms, tho' divers, yet the same in effect; Medeatur licet vulnere, qui morsus, au dilaniatus est, remanebit tamen Cicatrix. And it is truly approved by an ancient Christian Poet, thus;

Suspecti verèque rei.*

The guilty and suspected Innocent;
In Men's Esteem are little different.

For there is no more dangerous or fatal Destiny to Greatness, than to be intangled in the Multitude's Contempt, Odium & Contemptus, being the Two Evils that overthrow Kings and Kingdoms; the One, that is, Contempt, proceeding from the Vanity and Obstinacy of the Prince, the Other, from the Peoples Opinion of him and his Vices, and then he must neither reign nor live any longer. Ennius said with Cicero, Quem oderunt perisse expetunt: And so all that was practised upon the Fortune, Fame and Person of King Richard was by this Rule; (tho' in the Judgment and Equity of the most knowing in those Times) their cunning Translatio Criminis could take no Hold of him; neither appears it probable, that the Earl of Richmond himself (when he had got all Justice and Power in his Hand) did hold King Richard guilty of the Murder and Subornation of those Fellows, nor them the Assassins: For doubtless then, being so Wise and Religious a Prince, he would have done all Right to the Laws Divine and Humane, and that, I believe, in the extreamest and publickest way of Punishment, to make it more satisfactory and terrible to the People and Times: But they freely enjoy'd their Liberty with Security to natural Deaths, without any Question or Apprehension, Tyrrel excepted, who suffer'd for Treason not long after committed by him against King Henry himself. Neither was John Green (named a Party in this Murder) ever call'd in question; nor do the Historians of those Times (tho' mere Temporizers) charge him with this Practice against his Nephews, until after his Coronation, (some say, they surviv'd King Richard) and giving this respite of time, there was no Cause, why after that he should make them away, being then secure in his Throne and Title, and they long before pronounced incapable; First, by the Ecclesiastical Judges, then by the Barons and Parliament: And where was the cause

1485. cause of fear? But if King Richard had been of of that bloody Constitution, the Man whose Life could be most prejudicial unto him was the Earl of Warwick lawful Son of George Plantagenet Duke of Clarence, Elder Brother to King Richard: Now there was a Necessity for the Lancastrian Faction (if they must have a King of that Family) to take those Princes away, not to leave King Richard or his Son, nor yet any Legitimate Issue of Lancaster, for all those were before any of the House of Beauforts, in the true order of Succession, and stood in their way; so did the Progeny of Brotherton, of Woodstock, of both the Clarences, Gloucester, &c. Tho' they fear'd few, or none of those Titular Lords, being modest Men, not affecting Sovereignty, but content with their own private Fate and feudal Estate, when all was one with the Lancastrians, who were so vehement in their royal Approaches, that besides King Edward IV. and his two Sons, King Richard and his Son, the Prince of Wales, there was afterward (and as occasion served) The Earl of Warwick and Duke of Suffolk, and others, both Male and Female of that Princely Family, laid in their cold Urns, and it must be so, else there could be no place for the Beauforts and Somersets, their turns being last (the Kings of Portugal, of Castile, and other being before them, if not excluded by Act of Parliament.)

In this Tragedy there was a Scene acted by John de Vere Earl of Oxenford, which may be worthy of our Observation for Example sake, and makes not against the cause of Perkin.

This Earl of Oxenford much affected and devoted to King Henry VII. was a great Enemy to this Richard (alias Perkin) and I think the only † Enemy he had of the great Nobility, how this dislike grew I cannot say, whether out of Ignorance or Incredulity, or out of Malice, hating King Edward, and all that had a near Relation to that Family, or else to apply himself to the Honour of the King; but he and the Cardinal are said to be the chief Urgers of Perkins Dispatch, and he, being High Constable, pronounced the Sentence against the young Earl of Warwick, (which much distast'd the Country) and near to Heveningham Castle, (that was his chiefest Seat) there lived in the Woods an old Hermit (a very Devout and Holy Man as the Fame of those Times admit him) who seem'd much troubled to hear this News, for the love he bare to the ancient and noble Family of Oxenford, of much Anguish of Spirit, saying, the Earl and his House would repent, and rue that guilty and bloody Pursuit of the innocent Princes; for the Event of which Phrophecy this hath been observ'd.

Not long after, the Earl was arrested for an Offence so small, that no Man (considering his Merit and Credit with the King) could have thought it worth the Question, for which he was Fined at Thirty thousand Pounds, (in those days a Kingly Sum) (a) after this he liv'd many Years in great Discontent, and died without Issue, or any Child lawfully begotten by him, and in much shorter time than his Life-time, that great and (b) stately Earldom of Oxenford, with the opulent and Princely Patrimony, was utterly dissipated, and como sal in agna (as the Spaniard saith in the Refran) yet this Earl was a very Wise, Magnificent, Learned and Religious Man in the Estimation of all that knew him, and one more like to raise, and acquire a new Earldom. (c) But it thus fell and was wasted, the Castles and Mannors dilapidated, the Chappel wherein this John de Vere and all his Ancestors lay Intomb'd with their Monuments quite defaced to the Ground, their Bones left under the open Air in the Fields, and all this within less than Threescore Years after the Death of the said Earl John. About the same time these unhappy Gentlemen suffer'd, there was a base (d) Son of King Richard III. made away, having been kept long before in Prison. The Occasion as it seemeth, was the Attempt of certain Irish-men of the West and South Parts, who would have got him into their Power and made him their Chief; being strongly affected to any of the House of York, were they Legitimate or Natural, for Richard Duke of York's Sake, sometimes their Viceroy: And thus much in brief of that.

(e) Now to resolve a Question, why the King deferred so long the Death and Execution of the Earl of Warwick and Perkin, and took so much deliberation after he had resolv'd it; one Reason and the chiefest brought by some, is, That in regard Perkin was an Alien, and in the Allegiance of a foreign Prince, therefore he could not be Condemned, nor executed for Felony, nor Treason by our Laws: which is a ridiculous Evasion, for we have frequent Examples in our Stories, That the natural Subjects of France, of Scotland, Spain, Portugal, Germany, and Italy, have had Judgment and Execution by our Laws, for Felony and Treason, as Peter de Gaveston a Frenchman, Sir Andrew Hareley a Scot, and lately Dr. Lopez a Portugal; therefore apparently that was not the Cause the King so doubtfully, and (as it were) timorously deferred their Arraignments and Executions. The Heathens perhaps would have defined it some inward Awe or conceal'd Scruple, such as they call'd Eumenides and Erynnies, and believ'd haunted those Men that had purpos'd or acted a Wick- edness: Upon which the Poet said well:

—Patiturque unus mens saucia Manes.

And assign'd to every Man his protecting Spirit, whom the Greeks call'd Damones, the Latines Genios; concluding, that when the Genius of him against whom the Mischief aims, is Stronger and more Active than his who is to act it, there the Plot hardly taketh Effect.

For example, Produce the mortal Enmity between Octavianus Caesar and M. Antonius, in which Anthony could never prevail by any Attempt; who consulting with his Soothsayers, they give the reason to be the power of Octavianus's Genius above his. It is reported the great Philosopher Apollonius had such a secret Protection and so strong, that the Emperor Domitian had no power over his Life, tho' he studied means to take it; Suidas adding that this Philosopher in confidence of his Genius when he left the Emperor, added this Verse, Οὐ μὲν μὲν κλῆρον, ἔτι ἔτι μορσιμὸς εἶμι.

Me non occides quia fataliter protectus sum: which is that Flaminus Vopiscus calleth Majestatem Vopiscem in Apollonis (as I guess) and with it the Professors of Christian Religion agree in the Effects, not in the Causes; for those whom the Hea-

But to return to the Matters further Allegate and Probate. The industrious Antiquary Master John Stow, being requir'd to deliver his Opinion concerning the Proofs of this Murther, affirmed it was never prov'd by any credible Evidence, no not by probable Suspicions, or so much as by the Knights of the Post, that King Richard was guilty of it. And Sir Thomas Moore (being puzzled with his Equivocations) says, that it could never come to light what became of the Bodies of these two Princes. Grafton, Hall, and Hollinshead * agreeing in the same report, that the Truth hereof was utterly unknown. Then where is their far seeing Knowledge, that will have them transported into foreign Countries or Drowned, or their Gigantick Proofs, that say peremptorily, they were both Murthered and Buried in the Tower by those Four nam'd before: If so, we need go no further for the Truth. But these are Splenetick Reaches, and the Parachronism is too gross as the Comædian said,

Besides, if Perkin were not the second Son of King Edward, he must be nothing; for the Flemish, French, and Walloons acknowledged no such Noble young Man to be Born in Warbecke, or in Tourney ||; but make honourable mention of a young Son of the King of England, who was brought to the Dutcheß of Burgundy his Aunt, being then in Flanders, and how he was in 1485. France and in other Kingdoms. And surely so many Noble and Discreet English, if they had not known him to be the same by most certain Tokens, and Evidence, would not so confidently have laid down their Lives to confirm their Knowledge of him, or hazarded their Judgments and Honours upon an Imposture, or Vanity, especially those who had Places of Quality and Eminency near the King then living, and were in favour at Court. Therefore I would be resolv'd from our Anti-Richards, what Aim those Noblemen could have, in averring him the Son of Edward IV. by the hazard of their Lives and Estates (if the King pleased) and how could they expect less; for tho' they were enough to justify it a Truth, they were too few to maintain it against him, there could be no Aim or Hope to super-induce young Richard to be King: but merely I am perswaded in point of Truth and Honour, as they thought themselves bound to do, they freely tendred their Lives to make good what their Conscience and Knowledge witnessed, for it would be an Imposture of a miraculous Deception, so many worthy and wise Persons both of the Nobility and Clergy, some of them having served the King his Father and himself, that they all in their particular and general Intelligence and Understandings, should be Mistaken and Cheated. I say, it was a strange Delusion if it could be so; but indeed those that would have it so, leave it in Question, and know not well what to make of their own Relations, or how to resolve his History; and if we mark Sir Francis Bacon in the Life of Henry VII. (tho' his Speculation be tender, and as favourable as he can that way) touching the History of this young Duke, he gently slides from it.

* Hollinshead, as well as Sir Thomas Moor, says, Sir James Tyrrel, order'd them to be Buried under the Stairs, and when he brought word to King Richard what he had done with them, the King dislik'd the place of their Burial, because they were King's Sons; upon which Sir Robert Brackenbury's Chaplain removed their Bones to another place that was not then found out.

THE Title King Richard III. had to the Crown, accrued to him by the Illegitimacy of the Children of King Edward IV. and the Attainder of the Duke of Clarence, with the Corruption of his Blood, and Forfeiture of the Title in him and in his Heirs, of which there was no Question: But of the Forfeiture and Disinheritance of the Sons of Edward IV. there hath been much. The true Cause hath not nor cannot be well known, without the Narration of King Edward's sundry Loves and Wooings, specially his Contracts and Marriages.

How extreme his Desires were, you may see in the Speech of the D. of Buckingham, set down by Sir Thomas Moor.

I shall not need to intimate how Amorous and Wanton this King was, his many Mistresses or Amasia's he kept, in several private Places; whereof the most famous was Katharine de Clarrington, Elizabeth Wyatt alias Lucy, Jane Shore, the Lady Eleanor Talbot. And it is worth the remembering (in the Concourse of such Matters as these) there was another fair Creature so dear unto him, that his too much Affection begat Suspicion; of which he gave her a Kind Expression, by a quaint Device sent unto her in a rich Jewel, fashion'd much after the manner of the trivial Hieroglyphs us'd in France, and call'd Rebus de Picardy. The Device was, A Faulcon encompass'd with a Fetter-lock: The Mott, Au Faulcon Serrure. The Caution lying in the Ambiguity and double sense of Faulcon: which being whole and proper, signifieth a Hawk; but divided, hath an obscene Signification, and so Faulcon becometh an equivoque.

The King afterward was so affected with this Device, that he would have it carv'd and painted, in many of his Royal Works yet to be seen at Fotheringhay and elsewhere.

Yet altho' the King's Jealousie was thus particular to her, his Affection was as general to others; being a frank Gamester, and he that would cast at all, fairly set. Above all, for a time he was much speld with Eleanor Talbot, Daughter of John Talbot Earl of Shrewsbury (called in the Act of Parliament 1 Rich 3. The old Earl of Shrewsbury) her Mother was the Lady Katharine Stafford, Daughter of Humphrey Stafford Duke of Buckingham, and she the Widow of Thomas Lord Butler Baron of Sudeley. Her Beauty and sweetness of Disposition drew his Desire so vehemently, and with such respect, that he was suddenly Contracted, and after Married by Dr. Thomas Stillington Bishop of Bath, Councillor of State (one much favour'd by the King, and often employ'd by him in great Affairs.) This is witnessed by our English Writers, and veritable Philip de Comines, in these words: Le Evêque de Bath (lequel avoit esté Conseiller du Roy Edward) disoit que le dit Roy avoit promis foy de Mariage a une Dame d'Angleterre, & qu'il avoit nommé, & que le Roy avoit fait la promesse entre les mains dudit Evêque, & dit aussi c'est Evêque, qu'il avoit apres espousé, & n'y avoit que luy & ceux deux †.

In English thus:

The Bishop of Bath, a Privy Councillor of King Edward said, That the King had plighted his Faith to marry a Lady of England, whom the Bishop named the Lady Eleanor Talbot; and that this Contract was made in the hands of the Bishop, who said that afterwards he married them, no Persons being present but they twain and he, the King charging him strictly not to reveal it.

Which Contract and Marriage are related in the Act of Parliament aforesaid, where it is differently called a former Marriage, and the King had a Child by her. But where Desires are unlawful, they will be unlimited. We are ever young enough to sin; never old enough to repent: never constant, never satisfied in our nearest Desires. Though to Morrow shew us the Sting of to Day, the third shall betray us again; and we are taken (like Children in a Shop of Trinkets) by the Eye, liking all things, from one to another, until Pleasure dull Pleasure, and we grow weary of them. As in the Dotages of this King, who had now received others into the bosom of his Fancy; especially the Fame (which was then in every Courtier's Ear and Mouth) of an excellent Lady in the Court of France, with the Queen Charelots, Wife of King Lewis XI. and Sister to this Lady whose Name was Bona the Daughter of Lewis Duke of Savoy. And so suddenly and strongly had he taken fire and apprehension of her Report (the bent of his affection being merely wanton to every new Object, thinking Love a cold Composition, without the Privilege of Variety) that he straight falls into terms of engagement and capitulation of Marriage; to which purpose the great and renowned Richard Nevil Earl of Warwick and Salisbury, and Captain of Calais (then in the Esteem of his best and most trusty Friend) had a Commission of Treaty, and with all speed was sent Ambassador into France; who, with all Honour and Magnificence to his Wife effects it; with the more noble and easy dispatch, the Earl of Warwick being a Man eminent through all the Parts of Europe, for his Valour, Wisdom, and Heroical Vertues. Expecting a Welcom at his Return answerable to the period of his Employment, but finds an Alteration not only of the King's Affection, but of his Countenance: for in the interim he had (in an instant or particle of time as it were) wooed and wedded the Lady Elizabeth Gray, Relict of Sir John Gray, Daughter of Sir Richard Woodville, and of Jaquetta, sometime Dutches of Bedford, and the Daughter of the Earl of St. Poole. Her Husband was one Gray a Knight of Grooby, who became a very vehement Lancastrian, revolting from the House of York, and therefore the more hateful to those of that Family, and the Well-wishers thereof (so to the Earl of Warwick.) He was Slain at the Battle of St. Alban's: Of whom, and of this Lady his Wife, as of this Marriage, Philip de Comines relates something, which I shall leave to the Interpretation of the better knowing, and desire not to understand it in the words: Or de puis le dict Roy Eduart espousa la fille d'un Chevalier de Angleterre femme veufue, qui avoit deux filz & aussi per Amorettes.

But neither the despised state of Widowhood, nor the meanness of her Quality and Condition, the earnest Dissuasion of the Dutches his Mother and best Friends, could make him withdraw his Affection, so deeply and obstinately he was surprized with her Beauty: yet if he could have enjoy'd his Longings otherwise, he had not married her. But she was of so pregnant and reserv'd a Wit, (seconded by the Caution and Counsel of the Dutches her Mother) that his highest Temptations and sweetest Batteries could not win upon her; protesting never to yield to any dishonourable Parley or unchaste Motion, altho' it might warrant the safety of her Life; and humbly implored his Grace not to think her so exorbitantly and vainly Ambitious to wish her self a Queen, or to have the Hope and Presumption to be any thing higher than what she was, His poor and humble Vassal: Nor was she of so low and lost a Mind, as to violate her Chastity, or be a Concubine to the greatest King.

When the King perceiv'd there was no other Remedy but that he must shift his Sail to that scantling of Wind, he complies with her, and protests it was his Desire and Suit to marry her, notwithstanding her Inequality: for in his esteem, her Love, her Beauty, and her Vertue, made her Fortunes and Dowry great, and high enough for any King. Nor did he defer it any longer than there was Necessity; but marry her he did, and with such dispatch, that he stay'd not for the Advice of any, either Councillor, Kinsman, or other whatsoever.

Nay, his speed admitted not the approved Ceremony of the Banes asking. And such was the want of Reverend Bishops then, that he was fain to take an ordinary Priest to marry them, in a Chamber too, instead of a Church, and that in a Lodge or Forrest-House; no body being present but the Dutches, and some few of her Company. So where he first saw her (and by chance) there at the next Interview he married her; an Act of as high Exception as Improvidence. For his Barony thought it a most unworthy and unequal Match, distasting it the more, as done without their Consent, which they assever'd the King ought to have by their ancient Privileges: and were the more exasperated, considering the great Inequality between her Condition and the Imperial Majesty of England, being the Relict but of a poor Knight, his mortal Enemy too. Above all, the Earl of Warwick took it for an high Indignity and Scandal to his Honour, which stood so far engaged in France to the Lady Bona and her Princely Friends; knowing the French would be as sensible of the Scorn, besides the great Charge he had been at, to manage the Employment. In the heat of these Disgraces (for transcendent Spirits have their answerable Passions; and it is as dangerous to stand in their way, as in the Reaches of an angry Tide) he forsook the King, and soon after takes up Arms against him; an Induction to those succeeding Evils which pursu'd that inconsiderate Marriage: of which the judicious Polidor (lib. 24.) maketh this Censure.

Rex Edwardus mutato Concilio de ducenda uxorem Bona, filia Ducis Sabaudie, Elizabetham viduam Johannis Gray Militis, in Matrimonium duxit; & de eo Matrimonio ob mulieris humilitatem non modo necessarios Principes, verum etiam Richardum Woodvillum Patrem mulieris celat: qua causa cognita cuncti protinus mirari, Principes fremere, Passimque voces emittere indignationis, & Regem non ex sua dignitate fecisse, easque nuptias se crimini dare & dedecori assignare, quod caco amore non ratione ductus esset; sed inde initium profectum est similitatis orta inter Regem Edwardum & Richardum Comitem Warwici, &c.

In English thus:

"King Edward, having changed his Purpose of taking to Wife the Lady Bona Daughter to the Duke of Savoy, married Elizabeth the Widow of John Gray Knight; concealing upon the Account of the Meanness of her Birth, what he had done, not only from his Princely Relations, but even from Richard Woodville her Father: Which thing when it came to be known, was matter of Admiration to every one; The Nobles murmured thereat, and by their Words every where bewray'd the Indignation of their Heart, that the King had not acted suitably to his Dignity, and that they accounted this Marriage blame-worthy and dishonourable, because he was led thereto by blind Love, not by Reason. It was this which gave a Beginning to that Hatred and Enmity betwixt King Edward, and Richard the renowned Earl of Warwick, &c.

But if you will not give credit to him, you shall hear an English Prelate living in those Times.

Edwardus Rex fretus propria electione cujusdam Militis relictam nomine Elizabeth, inconsultis Regni proceribus clandestino sibi destinavit Matrimonio; postea ipsam in reginam Coronari fecit: quod quidem Regni optimates agre tulerunt, quia de tam mediocri stirpe faminam procreatam ad Regni Consortium secum præpropere sublimaret. That is,

"King Edward, without consulting with the Nobles of his Realm, and relying solely upon his own Choice, secretly married the Widow of a certain Knight, by Name Elizabeth; causing her afterwards to be crowned Queen: By which the Peers of the Kingdom were highly disgusted, because he had so unadvisedly exalted a Woman so meanly descended to a Partnership in Sovereignty.

Thus this amorous King lost his Honour, with many of his Best and great Friends: yet escap'd well, that he had no more real and present feeling of the Errour; being the first King of England that ever mingled his Royal Blood and Majesty in the Alliance of so private and mean a Family.

The Story of Arragon mentions a King depos'd for marrying the Daughter of his Subject; and King Edward was something near it; for soon after, he was expuls'd his Kingdom: But being a Man that kept an industrious and invincible Courage above his Troubles, he happily recover'd that Loss, never his Honour and Friends, which he might have preserv'd, and prevented all those Calamities that overtook him in his Issue, by the Advice of the Dutche's his Mother, who upon the secret Advertisement of his Love to this Lady Gray, us'd all the Perswasions and Authority of a Mother, to return him to the Lady Elizabet Talbot his former Love and Wife (at least his contracted) to finish and consummate what he was bound to by publick Solemnity of Marriage; and press'd it with such ingenious Engagements, that for the Arguments sake, I have transcrib'd the Passage out of Sir Thomas Moor and the rest of our English Writers. Thus she dissuades him.

The Speech of the Dutche's of York
to K. Edw.
IV.

"MY Liege Lord, and my Dear Son;
It is very commonly reported you are purposed to marry the Lady Gray, a Widow and a mean Gentlewoman, which you cannot but conceive will redound to your Disparagement and Dishonour: All the Wise, Great and Noblest Persons of your Kingdom, thinking it far more to the Advantage of your Honour, Profit and Safety, to seek the Alliance of a Noble Progeny, and rather in a Foreign Country than your own; as well in regard, thereupon may depend great Strength to your Estate, and great possibility to enlarge your Possessions by such Affinity. Also (if well consider'd) you may not safely marry any other than the Lady Bona, the Earl of Warwick having proceeded so far in the Current of that Match already, that 'tis likely he will not sit down contented, if his troublesome and costly Negotiation should be so slightly blown off and frustrated.
Besides, Sir, consider it is not Princely for a King to Marry his own Subject, (at least no great and important Occasion leading him thereunto, nor Possessions or other Commodity depending thereupon) but will be less tolerable to all Opinion, than if a Rich Man should marry his Maid, only for a little wanton Dotage upon her Person; in which kind of Marriages, many Men commend more the Maid's Fortune than the Master's Discretion. Yet there must needs be more Honesty in such a Marriage, than can be Honour in this which you affect: For the difference is not so great betwixt a rich Merchant and his Servant, as you must think between the King and the Widow Gray; in whose Person (albeit there be nothing to be misliked) there is nothing so excellent, but it may be found in divers other Women, much more Noble and many ways Exceeding her, and more comparatively to your Estate (those also Virgins, who must be thought of a much more honourable Estimation than Widows) wherefore the Widowhood only of Elizabeth Gray (tho' in all other things she were convenient for you) were not enough to restrain you, being a King, and so great a King.
And it must stick as a foul Disparagement to the sacred Majesty of a Prince (who ought as nearly to approach the Priesthood in Pure-ness and Cleanness, as he doth in Dignity) to be defiled with Bigamy in his first Marriage.

Thus far the King could with Attention hear the Dutche's; but being extremely far gone in Love, or rather in the hot Passion of Love, he was resolute to marry her; and partly in earnest, and partly in play (as one that well wist he was out of the Check of a Mother) yet reverently thus replied;

1485.

MADAM,

"ALTHO' Marriage, being a spiritual thing, ought rather to be made according to the Will and Ordinance of Almighty God, where he by his Grace inclineth either Parties to love mutually and virtuously (as I hope and trust he doth work in ours) and not for the regard of any temporal Advantage; yet, nevertheless, this Marriage (as it seemeth to me, being consider'd, even after the World's account) is not unprofitable nor without fruits: For I reckon not the Alliance and Amity of any earthly Nation or foreign Prince so necessary for me, as the Friendship and Love of mine own Subjects; who, as I hope, will be the more induced to love me, and acknowledge mine to them, seeing I disdain not to marry one of my own Land; when (if a foreign Alliance were thought so requisite) I could find the Means of that much better by other of my Kin (where all those Parties would be content) but to marry my self to one whom I should, peradventure, never love; and for the possibility of more Possessions, lose the Fruit and Pleasure of this I have already: For small Pleasure taketh a Man of all he hath, or can have, if he be Wived against his Appetite.

The Answer of K.
Edw. IV. to the Dutche's of York
ther.

"And I doubt not but there be (as you say, Madam) other Women in every point comparable to the Lady Gray; therefore I lett not other Men to Wed them, no more than have they reason to mislike where it liketh me.

"Nor doubt I my Cousin of Warwick's Love can be so slightly settled to me, as to grudge at that which I affect; nor so unreasonable, to look, that in my Choice of a Wife I should rather be ruled by his Eye than mine own; that were to make me a Ward, and bind me to marry by the Appointment of a Guardian; with such servile and hard Conditions I would not be a King.

"As for the possibility you urge of more Inheritance by new Affinity in strange Lands, that is not always certain; but contrariwise, it is oftentimes the occasion of more Trouble than Profit. Besides, we have already a Title and Seignie so good and great, as may suffice to be gotten, and so to be kept by one Man, and in one Man's Days.

"For your Objection, That the Lady Gray hath been a Wife, and is now a Widow, and hath already Children; Why, (By God's blessed Lady) I that am a Batchelor have some Children too; and so, for our better comfort, there is proof that neither of us is like to be barren. And I trust in God, Madam, you shall live to see her bring forth a young Prince, and your pretty Son, that shall be a Joy and Pleasure to you.

"For the Bigamy objected, let the Bishop lay it hardly in my way, when I come to take Orders of Priesthood; for I confess I understand Bigamy is forbidden to a Priest, but I never wist it yet forbidden to a Prince; therefore I pray you, Good Madam, trouble your self and me no further in this Matter.

Then she urged his Contract (a) with the Lady Elizabeth Lucy, and his having had a Child by her, (as she said) and thought her self bound in Conscience to charge him with. Mr. Moor, Grafion, Stow and the rest, say, The King utterly denied that Contract, and protested it a Slander; which well and justly he might do, and these Authors may retract what they have written. For the truth is, he was never contracted to her, tho' he loved her well, being of an affable and witty Temper; nor did she ever alledge the King was betrothed to her, but that he had entangled her by sweet and tempting Language: And who knoweth not Credula res Amor est? But true it is, he had a Child by her, which was the Bastard Arthur, called commonly (but unduly) Arthur Plantagenet, afterward made Viscount Lisle by H. VIII.

Elizabeth Lucy.

In this Relation, the Historians have much and foully err'd; not only corrupting the Story, but have injured the Dutcheſs of York in her Judgment and Knowledge of these Matters; and the tenor of her former Speech, making her to charge the King as contracted to this Elizabeth Lucy (of Birth and Quality much meaner than the Lady Grey whom she conceived so basely of; for Elizabeth Lucy was the Daughter of one Wyat of Southampton, a mean Gentleman, (if he were one) and the Wife of one Lucy, as mean a Man as Wyat. True it is, the King kept her as his Concubine, and she was One of those most famous Three who had peculiar Epithets, being call'd his Witty Leman). For that they would have her say the King was never betrothed to her, it importeth nothing, and therefore, I conceive, it was never extracted from her. But truly to save the Story and Error of these Writers, we must know, that Lady to whom the King was first betrothed and married, was Elianaor Talbot, Daughter of a Great Peer of this Realm, of a most noble and illustrious Family, the Earl of Shrewsbury, who is also called in authentick Writings the Lady Butler, because she was then the Widow of the Lord Butler, (a Lady of a very eminent Beauty and answerable Virtue) to whom the King was contracted, married, and had a Child by her. This is that Lady (not Elizabeth Lucy) the Queen spoke of to her Son; and (to note Obiter) the King's Breach with this Lady, was a Cause the subtil Widow would not listen unto him before Marriage, having learned Credulitas damno solet esse puella. This Marriage cast the Lady Elianaor Butler into so perplex a Melancholy, that she spent her self in a solitary Life ever after: And how she died is not certainly known; but out of doubt, Kindness was not the cause, he having a Kindness for every new Face, and was so become exceedingly fancied to his new Wife the Lady Gray, no Court or Pleasure now, but where she is. In this continuance of his amorous Indulgence, (which was many Years, and rendred a fruitful Issue to him) no question, that Party of her Kindred made their best Advantage from it: Yet the Remembrance of that Pre-contract after a time, moved him by such sensible Apprehensions, he could not brook to have it mention'd; which was the cause of his Displeasure against his ancient Chaplain Dr. Stillington of Bath, because he did what his Conscience urg'd, to God and the Kingdom, in discovering the Marriage, occasion'd by the Lady's sudden Indisposition and pressing Ovid.

Sorrow; who not able to contain her self, had open'd it to a Lady her Sister; or, as some say, to her Mother the Countess of Shrewsbury; she, to the Earl her Husband; he consults it with his noblest Kinsfolks and Friends, as it was a general Scandal to them all: They to inform themselves the better, had Conference with Dr. Stillington, who affirmed the Contract and Marriage, with whom they advise; that as he was a Bishop and a Privy Counsellor, it behoved him to prepare it to the King's Consideration for some Redress and Satisfaction. But the Bishop (tho' willing) durst not deal with the King in that manner; rather wish'd they would apply it to the Duke of Gloucester, as the Man most inward with the King; whereof Philip de Comines thus writeth; Cestuy Evesque d' Bath, mit Philip de Comines en avant a ce Dux Gloucester, que le dit Roy Edouart estoit fort amoureux, d'un Dame, d' Angleterre, & luy promise de l' espouser pour veu qu'il couchat avec illa, elle s'y consentit: & dit ceste Evesque, qu'il les avoit Espousees, & n'y avoit que luy & eux deux.

The Duke of Gloucester, as they desir'd, pres'd it to the King, who became more incens'd against the Bishop, saying, He had not only betray'd his Trust, but his Children; and upon that Heat puts him from the Council-Table under a strict Imprisonment for a long time, which at length he redeem'd himself from by a heavy Fine, as is testified by Dr. Goodwin Bishop of Hereford, in his Catalogus Episcoporum, who writeth thus; Philip de Comines, le Roy Edw. de supposé l'Evesque, & le tient in prison, & le Ransom de un bon somme d' Argent. Which was taken for a peice of more Passion than Justice; the Bishop not deserving so to suffer in this case, where his Conscience might very well excuse what he did.

Not long after, King Edward died; of what Disease it is doubtfully suggested: Some thought of an Apoplexy or Dead Palsie. Polidor Virgil saith, of a Disease utterly unknown to all the Physicians, which leaves it to a further Construction. The Author of the History of Britain, delivers plainly, that King Edward was kill'd by Poison (as the common Report in France went). Aucuns disoient que le Roy de Angleterre Edouart, avoit esté Empoisonné au mois d' avril en l' an. 1463. And Euguerant de Monstrolet writeth, That some said he died of an Apoplexy; others, He was Poison'd in Wine of Creu, which King Lewis the Eleventh sent to him. Philip de Comines, to that purpose, says, Aucuns disent que le Roy Edouart, mourut d'un Catarrhe; that is, Some say that King Edward died of a Catarrhe; for that is their Phrase in France when a Great Man is made away by Poison. Of such a venomous Catarrhe died the young King Edward VI. But by whose Hand King Edward IV. had his Death, it is not said; certain it is, he was generally beloved of all his Subjects, except those of the Lancastrian Faction. As soon as he was dead, the Silence brake into a general Muttering against his Marriage, then into loud and publick Inveighing against it: All Tongues were at liberty, and Pardons were hoped for all Offences; the general and common Opinion being quite against it and the Children. And Dr. Morton affirmed, The Duke of Buckingham, with other Noble Lords, saw and read certain authentick Instruments made and sign'd by learned Doctors, Proctors and Notaries, with the Depositions

How K. Edward died.

Lib. 4. in Hist. Brit.

Monstrolet, Part 3. de ce Chron.

(a) Hollinshed says she only caused a Præ-contract to be alledg'd made by him with the Lady Elizabeth Lucy; "But all Doubts removed, all Things made clear, and all Cavillations avoided, he privily in the Morning married her. Pag. 668.

Or if after the second Marriage (and while he flourished, which was by the space of Fourteen Years) he had either by a due Consideration, or Counsel of his best Friends, wrought the Pope's Pardon for breach of the Pre-contract with the Lady Eliaenor; then, his Apostolical Bull of Dispensation, for his Post-contract, or Matrimony superinducted (as they call it) which might easily have been obtain'd at Rome, for Money. And after that, to have summon'd a Parliament, requiring the three Estates to have ratify'd and confirm'd these Bulls, for the Approbation of the said Marriage with the Lady Gray, and the Legitimation of his Children, and made them lawful by Act of Parliament (according to the Pope's Indulgence (which was then a Sacred and most Inviolable thing.) Lastly, to have declared, pronounced and decreed in Parliament, That the said Children of the King, being so made Legitimate, were also capable of all Honours, Dignities, Estates, publick and private, of which the King stood seised, or which were any ways appertaining and proper to the Kingdom of England, and of France. I say, If he had done this, he had compos'd all Defects, and prevented all succeeding Dangers of Claims and Practices, which might have been done with small or no trouble. A Course by another afterward opportunely thought on.

And surely (it may be conjectur'd) if this King had not been too Secure, and lost in his Sensualities, he would by the like Parliamentary Power have rectified those Errours, these great, high and difficult Works, being (indeed) proper to Parliaments, and pregnant and strong Proofs of their great and transcendent Power, holding in themselves a just Desert and Claim of such Power and Authority (if assembled and held as they ought) being a General Assembly and Convocation of the most Wise, Honourable, Just, and Religious Persons of the Kingdom. Therefore the word Parliament (saith one) is compounded of Parium and lamentum, because (as he thinketh) the Peers of the Country did at these Meetings complain each to other of the Enormities of their Country. But the better opinion is, That Parliament is simply from the French word parler (and that from the Greek παρλαμε, both signifying to speak) and so by adding the termination, ment (which is common in the French Tongue, as well to many Nouns as Adverbs) do make up Parliament; meaning thereby an Assembly of Men called together to speak or confer, &c.

And it may not unfitly be call'd Parliament, for that each Man should parler, lament, speak his Mind. But Laurence Valla misliketh that Etymology. 1485.

It may be guess'd the word Parliament (being transported out of France) began shortly after the Norman Conquest. One of the first authentical Reports of that Name, is found in the Statute 3 E. 1. commonly call'd Westminster Parliament; that Assembly being said to be Primier generall apres Coronament le Roy. But that is not the first word: for in the Statutes call'd Articuli Cleri, publish'd 9 E. 2, these words are read: Temporibus progenitorum nostrorum quondam Regum Anglie Parliamentis suis, &c. Which words Progenitorum & quondam, must needs reach higher than E. 1. that was but Father to him that spake it.

But at what time soever after the Conquest this Court began to be call'd a Parliament, the same was before known to the Saxons or Englishmen, by the word Sinoth, and Micell Sinoth, of the Greek συνοδος, now appropriated to Ecclesiastical Meetings only; and sometimes by these terms, Micell, Gemote, Witengemott, and Calca Witengemott; that is, the meeting of Wifemen, or of all the Wifemen: for witena signifieth Wife men, Calca, all, and Gemott, a Meeting: Of which last words the Names Shire-motts, Eolmotts, and Halymotts; that is, the meeting or assembling of the Men of a Shire, of a Town, and of the Tenants of a Hall or Manor, had their beginning also.

Now as Sinoth is more used in the Parliaments themselves; so Gemott is more familiar to the Historians.

And this Parliament of Anno 1 Rich. 3. could be of no less Power and Vertue; witness the many and good Laws made in it, (albeit the second Marriage of King Edward was adjudged unlawful, and the Acts of that Parliament for the most part repeal'd and abrogated afterward) yet the Evidence is clear enough, that the Judges and Law-makers of that Parliament, were wise and religious Men, and their Laws upright and just.

Therefore whatsoever was adjudged by them, was to be received and held as authentick and inviolable (how roughly soever it was afterward handled.) And in this case of the disabling of King Edward's Sons, there is least reason to suspect them, the Cause being so new, so plain, and notoriously known, that no Man could be ignorant therein: Therefore to have given any other Judgment, but according to the truth of Evidence, and certainty of Knowledge, it might justly have been censur'd an act of Errour and Ignorance, or Partiality and Injustice.

For it was not the Opinion of a few, nor raised out of a weak Judgment and perverted Knowledge; but a strong and general Evidence, by the ablest and best knowing.

If it be objected, The Case was obscure and doubtful: That cannot be; for the Estates had all Substantial and ready Means to inform themselves of the Truth, and every Circumstance whereby they might be fully satisfy'd and clear'd in all the Niceties and Doubts: for all the Witnesses and Dealers in that Cause, and such Persons as were acquainted with it, were then living; and they must and would have truly and certainly inform'd the Court of Parliament: For the special and reverend Care of this Court is, The advancing of Justice and Right. Therefore all Subjects (by Nature or Grace) are bound in their Allegiance, to give Pious and Religious credit to Parliaments, and to believe in their Authority and Power, as the former Times did in How King Edward might have prevented all after-questions.

The Authority of Parliament.

Parliament, how so called and derived.

Laurence Valla.

1485. in Oracles. We must also confidently hold the high and transcendent Quality and Vertue of that Court, to have all Power and Authority: And no question to repeal a good and just Law made in Parliament, is a Wrong and Scandal to that General Council, and to the universal Wisdom, Providence, Justice and Piety of the Kingdom.

In the Parliament 1 H. 7. there is an Act, attainting the King R. III. of High Treason, for bearing Arms against the Earl of Richmond, Intituled, The Sovereign Lord (this was at his proceeding from Milford-Haven into Leicester;) But when he came to fight the Battel, he was then no King, nor Sovereign, but a Chief of such as made Head against their Sovereign. In which Paragraph there appears three gross Faults.

First, Certain it is, Richard during his Reign was a Sovereign, therefore no Subject.

Next, There was no Enemy in the Field who was then a Sovereign, but all Liege Subjects to the Crown.

And Richard being the King and Sovereign, could not be adjudged a Traytor, nor lawfully attainted of High Treason. Then let it be consider'd whether a Person of Sacred Majesty (that is, an anointed Sovereign) may commit the Crime of Treason. Also in this Parliament, all the Barons, Knights and Gentlemen that bore Arms in the Field for the King, were attainted of Treason, their Goods and Lands confiscate: And one Thomas Nandick (a Necromancer and Sorcerer, who with others had been condemned to die, for using that hellish Art) was in this Parliament pardon'd the horrible Things he had committed. And it seem'd he had not then left his Black Trade: for he hath in that Act of Parliament still the Stile of Conjurer: Viz.

Thomas Nandick of Cambridge, Conjurer: which had been a fitter Stile for his Gibbet than his Pardon; although he had not by his Sorcery or Inchantment hurt or destroy'd any Human, yet for his Renouncing and Abjuration of Almighty God: for it is the Opinion of a Learned and Religious Doctor:

Magos & Incantores (saith he) hominum genus indignum, quod vel ob solam Dei, O. M. abjurati- nem capitali supplicio afficiatur; i. e. Magicians and Inchanters, a wretched sort of Men, that even upon the Account of their Abjuring of Almighty God, deserve to undergo a Capital Punishment.

Other such things there be in that Parliament, which detract it in the opinion of some; those of the Best and Wisest repute.

The Treaty of Marriage between K. R. 3. and his Niece the Lady Elizabeth Plantagenet. Now let us come to examine that Treaty the King had about marrying the Lady Plantagenet; which is censured to be a thing not only Detestable, but much more Cruel and Abominable to be put in Agitation.

Item, That all Men, and the Maid her self most of all, detested this unlawful Copulation.

Item, That he made away the Queen his Wife, to make way for this Marriage; and that he propounded not the Treaty of Marriage, until the Queen his Wife was Dead.

That there was such a Motion for the Marriage of this Lady to the King, is true; and (which is more, and most certain) it was entertain'd, and well-lik'd by the King and his Friends, a good while; also by the Lady Elizabeth, and by the Queen her Mother; who received it with so much content and liking, 1485. that presently she sent into France for her Son the Marquess of Dorset, that was there with the Earl of Richmond, earnestly soliciting him to renounce the Faction, and return home to the King's Favour and Advancement, which she assured him: and sends † the Lady Elizabeth to Attend the Queen at Court, or to place her more in the eye, so in the Heart of the King. The Christmas following (which was kept in Westminster-Hall) for the better colour of sending her eldest Daughter, she sends her other four thither, who were received with all honourable courtesie by the King and Queen Regent; especially the Lady Elizabeth was ranked most familiarly in the Queen's Favour, and with as little distinction as Sisters. But Society, nor all the Pomp and Festivity of those Times, could cure that sad Wound and Languor in the Queen's Breast, which the Death of her only Son had left. The Address of those Ladies to Court (albeit the feign'd wooing of the King was in a politick and close way) gave cause of Suspicion to the Earl of Richmond's intelligencing Friends, that the King had a Purpose to marry the Lady Elizabeth; which must prevent the Earl both of his Hope to her, and to the Crown by her Title: a Clause that made them mutter very broadly against it (for indeed, what more concern'd them?) therefore the King treats it more privately and coldly; but the Queen-Widow and the Lady stood constant in their Desires and Expectation; only the Objection was, The King had a Wife; as tho' he could not marry another whilst she liv'd; not remembering how usual it was, not only for Kings, but private Men, to put away one Wife and marry another, for venial Crimes, as well as Adultery and Treason.

The Romans might repudiate their Wives, for conversing with Men that were not of their Kindred, and for going to see Plays and Cirque Spectacles, (their Husbands not being with them) or if the Wife were unquiet or curst of her Tongue, &c. Henry VIII. put away Queen Katharine of Castile, and Queen Anne of Cleve; the one, because she was too old and cold for Pleasure; the other, because she was not fruitful or wanton enough. Sometimes Men have put away their Wives for being Sluts, for having unfavoury Breaths, or some Infectious Disease, without a Necessity of taking away their Lives; and it was lawful for either of them to marry when they would.

Pope Clement VII. so ratify'd the Divorce of King Henry VIII. against Katharine of Castile, as he defy'd all Laws (Divine and Human) that should contradict and impugn his Power and Dispensation, in these words:

Non obstante Jure Divino nec Humano, nec quibuscunque Constitutionibus repugnantibus, aut in contrarium Edictis. That is, "Any Law of God or Man; or whatsoever Constitutions inconsistent, and to the contrary, notwithstanding."

There was a formal Bill or Libel of Separation prescribed by Moses, with the manner of Divorces and Repudiations, in this tenour, as Andreas Osiander (who translated it out of Hebrew into Latin) affirmeth: which for the Rarity I have here transcribed.

But the Answer which was made in the Name of the King to the Lady Elizabeth concerning his Queen, was, That she could be no Impediment of long continuance, being a very weak Woman in a Consumption, and past hopes of Recovery; her Physicians giving their Opinions, she could not live past the middle of February next following: nor guessed they much amiss; for she died in the next Month, March. When the midst and last of February was past, the Lady Elizabeth being more impatient and jealous of the Success than every one knew or conceived, writes a Letter to the Duke of Norfolk, intimating first, that he was the Man in whom she affied, in respect of that love her Father had ever bore him, &c. Then she Congratulates his many Courtesies, in continuance of which, she desires him to be a Mediator for her to the King, in the behalf of the Marriage propounded between them; who, as she wrote, was her only Joy and Maker in this World, and that she was his in Heart and Thought: withal insinuating, that the better part of February was past, and that she feared the Queen would never Die.

All these be her own Words, written with her own Hand; and this is the sum of her Letter, which remains in the Autograph, or Original Draft, under her own Hand, in the magnificent Cabinet of Thomas Earl of Arundel and Surrey: By which it may be observed, that that this young Lady was ignorant that a Man having a Wife living might marry another, and suffer her to live. But the truth is, the King had no real intent to make her his Wife, from the beginning; only in Policy entertain’d this Treaty, as it appear’d afterward, when his Queen was Dead, and he had all fit Accesses without any Impediment to marry her, yet did not; professing he wooed her not to that end, but for some other Causes; and made Protestation (in the great Hall at Saint Jones near Smithfield, before all the Knights of Malta, and a great Assembly of Noblemen; the Lord Maior, Aldermen, and many Citizens being present) that he had no purpose nor intent to marry the Lady Elizabeth: avowing, Quod ea res (viz.) Vo-

luntas contrabendi Matrimonium cum Consangu- nea Germana sua, nunquam ei venerat in mentem:
that is, ‘That this Matter, viz. a Design of ‘contracting Matrimony with his Kinswoman ‘Elizabeth, had never entred into his Mind.

For so it is testify’d by the Prior of Croyland.
Yet it may not be denied, he pretended love to her, and a proffer of Marriage; which he projected in Policy, to divert her Affection from Richmond (whose Party the King apprehended privately wrought that way; of which the said Author thus saith, Non aliter videbat
Richardus Rex regnum sibi confirmari, neque spem
competitoris sui auferri posse, nisi in Matrimonio, cum dicta Elizabeth, contrabendo vel simulando.
In English thus: ‘King Richard did not see how ‘otherways the Kingdom could be confirmed to ‘himself, and his Competitor be deprived of all ‘Hope, than by contracting a Marriage with the ‘said Elizabeth, or pretending it. And it is most likely the King had no other Aim but merely of Prevention: neither was there any Cause (had he been so wicked) to do it by Blood, The Q. di-nor any just Reason to frame so hard an Argument against him, being always so affectionately inclined to his Wife, that he was rather thought uxorious than otherwise; † which appeared unfeignedly at her Death, in the expression of Sorrow and magnificent Exequies for her. Non cum immorte bonore quam Reginam dicunt, as the Prior of Croyland testifieth. Let us look therefore with clearer Consideration upon the Motion or Pretence of this Marriage:
to call it Detestable and Cruel, is Ignorant and Malicious (tho’ she were so near of kin to him)
for Marriages between Uncles and Nieces, have been very frequent and allowed in other Countries by the Church. In our time, the Daughter and Heir of Duke Infantazgo in Spain, was married to his Brother Don Alde Mendoza:
and more lately, the Earl of Miranda married his Brother’s Daughter.

In the House of Austria, Marriages in this kind have been very usual, and thought lawful, the Pope dispensing with them; for they say in Spain, Que el padre santo quiere Dios loquiere: Therefore how could it be so highly unlawful in K.
Richard? Or if his Intents had been so forward, where was the Bar when his Wife was dead,
and he absolute, unless the Lady’s Averseness?
But that Suggestion is answer’d by her own Letter and other Testimonies. So the Account will be (if rightly sum’d by what hath been produced) that he had never any serious Determination of Marriage; only took the advantage of his Gain, by looking into her Hand; then no cause to make away his Queen; which his Ac-

But 'altho' he had the Commendations of a loving and indulgent Husband, I say not he lived always continently; for I find he had some Bastards, two of them I have mention'd; yet peradventure he might have them before his Marriage, and then the fault was less. So then, let them that affect not blind and traditory Opinion, more than Justice and Reason, but equally examine his Slanders, they shall find Malice and Ignorance have been the King's greatest Accusers, which can only lay Suspicion to his charge: and Suspicion in Law, is no more Guilt than Imagination: For tho' Suspicion many times, lay a great Blame upon a Man, (Men holding him to be guilty whom Men suspect to be so, tho' injuriously) yet the Law holds it not a Crime, because Suspicion, many times, supposeth those to be culpable which are not: For an Instrument may as easily be condemn'd as a Malefactor, being an Evil grown from the Error of Men. Wherefore Suspicion of it self bringeth no Sentence by Law, Natural or Moral, Civil or Divine, according to that of the old Minographus, Suspicio grave est hominibus malum. And the Divine Chrysostom saith, A Good Man hardly suspecteth another to be Evil; but an Evil Man scarcely supposeth any to be Good; far from the Counsel of this Epigram:

Culpare in quoquam quæ non sunt nota, malignum. (est; 1485.)
Preferim si quum cognita sint bona sunt.
Non pateant faciles duris rumoribus aures
Quæ nescire juvat, credere non libeat.
Linguantur secreta Deo, qui quicquid opertum est
Inspicit, & nullis indiget indicibus.

Accuse no Man of Faults to thee unknown,
 And much less him from whom good Fruits have grown:
 Lend not thine Ears to scandalous Reports;
 Believe not that, which known, nought thee imports.
 Leave secret Things to God, who knows all Hearts,
 And hath no need of the Promoter's Arts.

But as Julius Caesar (who had many excellent Observations) was wont to say, Vir bonus tam suspicione quam crimine carere oportet: That a good Man must be as well without Suspicion as Crime. Yet none so innocent but may fall under the Lash of the Malicious: For such, like the Polypus, will take any Colour, or make any tincture of a Crime to serve their Ends. Of such a Virtue is the never-understanding Vulgar, that like Kites and Daws can digest nought but Stench and Filth; their Ignorance being their Faith, and that drawn from loose Pamphlets, and the Vomit of mercenary and mimic Pens; to which, and their incurable Fits, I leave them.

BOOK V.

The ARGUMENT of the Fifth Book of the LIFE and REIGN of RICHARD III.

What a Tyrant is, and how a Tyrant and King Richard differ. The Destruction of the Plantagenets. The Daughters of King Edward how bestow'd. The Death of the Queen their Mother. The Virtues of King Richard the Third. The Elogy of the Three Brothers, King Edward the Fourth, George and Richard. The Magnificent, Publick and Charitable Buildings of King Richard the Third: His good Laws, and other good Works. That to die in the Wars is no Dishonour, but an Honour: Artes Regiæ Crimen regale: His Comparison with other Kings accounted good. King James's gracious Demeanour to his Cousins. A Character and Elogy of King Richard the Third. The Title of the Norman Race and of York defended. The sundry Titles of King James. The Wedding Ring of England. Lapis Regno fatalis. King Richard's Sepulchre and Epitaph. The Author's Scope; Peroratio & Votum.

What a Tyrant is.

WE will next endeavour to understand that Vocabule or Term Tyrannus (that is, a Tyrant, or an Evil King) cast upon King Richard; which, indeed, comprehendeth all Scandals and Impieties whatsoever.

Tyrannus est qui suis propriis Commodis studet, & publicis adversatur. And, Tyrannus est qui dominatu crudeliter abutitur. That is,

"A Tyrant is one who endeavoureth only his own Advantage, and is an Enemy to that of the Publick. And again, A Tyrant is one that abuseth his Authority to Cruelty.

A Tyrant is, by another Wise Man, compar'd to a Dragon, who becometh not a Dragon until he hath devoured many Serpents: Of which Conceit this Epigram was wittily framed.

Post plures Coluber Serpentes Draco fit esus,
Gustata humanâ carne fit Homo Lupus.

The Dragon which doth many Serpents eat,
 Becomes a Dragon of huge shape and strength;
 And so the Man which makes his Flesh Man's Meat,
 Transformed is into a Wolf at length.

Another Philosopher differeth not much from these, who saith, That of all Tame Beasts the Flatterer is most pernicious; and of all Wild the Tyrant, who forbeareth not for any respect of Good or Ill, but studies Oppressions, Wrongs,
 Vol. I. D d d Exactions,

Bis apud Plut. Lib. de adulat. 37.

1485. Exactions, Robberies, Sacriledges, Blood-shed, Murder, Adultery, Incest, Rape, Riot, Gluttony, Luxuriouſneſs, Prodigality, and all manner of Exceſſes: Theſe be his Arts of Reigning, and theſe be his Virtues, Lucan. Invident Tyranni claris fortisque trucidant.

Tyrants with envious Eyes the Brave behold,
And murder in cool Blood the Valiant and the Bold.

They force the Wretch to live, the happy Man to die.

So it was truly ſaid by the famous Orator of Athens,

Demosth. Liberalitas Tyranni nihil aliud eſt quam tranſlatio pecuniarum à juſtis Dominis, ad alienos idque indignos. That is,

“ The Liberality of a Tyrant is nothing elſe
“ but the Taking away from the rightful Owners “ that which belongs to ‘em, and giving it unto “ others, and thoſe unworthy thereof.

His Thirſt and Covetouſneſs, for his largitious Riots and Luſts, are ſo inordinate, that nothing can quench it.

Claudian. in Ruſſis.

Non Tartarici illum ſatiaret arenis Tempeſtas pretioſa Tagi, non ſtagna rubentis, Aurea Pactoli, totumque exauſerit Hermum, Ardebit majore ſiti, &c.

Not Tagus golden Tide can e’re aſſwage,
Nor red Pactolus quench his avaricious Rage.
Give him whole Hermus at a Draught; his Thirſt Inflam’d demands yet more ———

Quicquid conſpicuum pulchrumque ex Equore toto, Res ſiſci eſt, &c.

Theſe may ſerve for the Notions of a Tyrant: to any of which Impieties our King Richard was very little, or not at all obnoxious.

For Firſt, Whereas a Tyrant impoſeth many grievous Taxes and Oppreſſions upon his Subjects, he took away ſuch Grievances, and particularly, by Act of Parliament, a hateful Tax (tho’ diſguiſed with the name of a Benevolence) forbearing to impoſe any upon the People.

Then, a Tyrant doth not only rapine his Subjects, but ſpoils and robs Churches and Church-men; but King Richard did many good Things both for the Publick Good, advancing God’s Service, and maintainance of his Miniſters and Church-men.

Tyrannum pium eſſe non eſt facile, (as Sophocles well obſerv’d.) And the Oracle pronounc’d, Porta felicitatis ad Tyrannidem clauiſa. Tyrants be cruel and bloody; but this King, by the Teſtimony of his Enemies, was very Merciful and Mild; who confeſs he was of himſelf Gentle and affably diſpoſed. Theſe be their own Words.

Therefore, where tyrannical Acts be objected againſt him, they muſt be conceiv’d done by other Men, or by their Practice, or elſe before he was King; and what he did then, was not, nor cou’d be properly call’d Tyranny.

Amongſt thoſe they impute to him when he was King, which are call’d Tyrannies, the Be-heading Henry Stafford Duke of Buckingham was the chiefeſt; yet that Act, the Cauſe and juſt Motives of it being well perufed, cannot be cenſured Tyranny; rather due and neceſſary Juſtice: For if the King had not put down the Duke, the Duke would have put down the King.

Then it is objected, he bare a tyrannical Hand over his Nephew Edward Earl of Warwick. True it is, he ſent him to Sbery-Hutton, a goodly and pleaſant Houſe of his own in Yorkſhire, where he had Liberty, large Diet, all Pleaſure and Safety; and if that were Imprifonment, it was a Priſon Curtoife (as John Froiſard ſaith) yet this muſt not be leſs than Tyranny, according to the Stile of Sir Thomas Moor. When King Henry VII. as ſoon as he had got the Crown, ſent this young Prince to the Tower, and afterwards cut off his Head; yet that was no Tyranny, after Sir Thomas Moor. But our King James (of ever happy Memory) hath thought it an Act of ſo much deteſtation, that particularly he proteſted againſt it, and ſhewed another temper of Juſtice and Power in his Royal Clemency to certain Noble Perſons in one of his Kingdoms, who being Regal Titulars, and pretending Title to the Crown there (as deſcended from ſome King of that Country) his gracious and pious Inclination was ſo far from ſeeking their Ruin (or ſo much as the reſtraining them) that he ſuffer’d their Liberty, with poſſeſſion of what they had.

Then they call the Punishment of Jane Shore a Tyranny: A common and notorious Adultereſs (as the Duke of Buckingham, who knew her very well, cenſured her) which ſhe deſerv’d ſo juſtly, that it was rather favourable, than ſevere or tyrannous.

Next, the Death of William Collingborn is made one of his Tyrannies; who (as ſome trivial Romancers ſay) was hanged for making a Satyrical Rhime; when the truth is, he had committed Treason, and was arraign’d and condemn’d of High Treason, as may be yet ſeen in the Record; and then it was Juſtice and not Tyranny.

Another Proof againſt their groſs Paralogiſms, take from this Obſervation made by Demosthenes: Tyrannus res eſt inimica Civibus, legibus contraria. But K. Richard was ever indulgent to his People, careful to have the Laws duly obſerv’d; his making ſo many good ones, being an evident argument of his love to Law and Juſtice. It is further obſerv’d, that Tyrants contemn good Counſel, are opinionated of their own Wiſdoms, and obſtinate to determine all Matters by themſelves.

The Plaintiffs being call’d by the Greeks ἱδρόφατοι, that is, Self-councillors, who ſay they are Natura plerumque occulti & inſidioſi, & Arte, & Aſtu, ea Tegere, & diſſimulare conantur, quæ agunt, non communicantes quicquid de ſuis Conciliis, ſententia aut rebus cum aliis, nec ab aliis Concilium petentes, neq; Arribica, admittentes, ſed tantum ſua Concilia ſequuntur.

That is,

“ By Nature for the moſt part ſecret and “ cloſe, and alſo treacherous; and by Deceit
“ and Artifice endeavour to cover and diſſemble “ what they do, not communicating any of “ their Deſigns or Affairs to others, nor asking “ or admitting of any Advice, but are only “ manag’d by their own Counſels.

Alſo Erasmus hath this Axiom; Nullo Concilio quicquam magnæ rei aggredi, tyrannicum eſt.

But King Richard neither did, nor would do any thing of importance, without Conſultation with the wiſeſt and nobleſt. And if in any Matters he had deliver’d his Judgment, yet his manner (as 1485. (as his Detractors confess) was, to say in the End and Conclusion; My Lord, this is my mind; if any of you know what may else be better, I shall be ready to change it: for I am not wedded to my own will. Thus Sir Thomas Moor.

Caligula Lastly, Largition and excessive Expences are thought Vices proper to Tyrants; the rather, because the Roman Tyrants, for their extreme Excesses, were call'd Monstra & prodigia, & lues Imperii, pestes reipublicæ, &c. As Caligula, Nero, Vitellius, Domitian, Commodus, Heliogabalus, Caligula, &c.

King Richard was ever held to be frugal, with the preservation of his Honour; nor can they tax him with Palliardise, Luxury, Epicurism, nor Gluttony, Vices following many Tyrants; but moderate and temperate in all his Actions and Appetites; which is confess'd, and therefore needeth no further Proof. Indeed, it had been Advantage and Safety to him in the Event, if he had been a Tyrant a while; for then he might have preserv'd his Life and Kingdom, and given a timely Check to the Practice of Bishop Morton, the Marquess Dorset, Earl of Devon, and his Brother the Bishop, the Lord Talbot, the Lord Stanley, and his Brother Sir William Stanley, with the Countess of Richmond his Wife, and the rest. But his Remissness and Patience bred his Ruin, not his Tyranny; that had been his Protection.

And now the black Curtain of Malice and Detraction is drawn, let us see this King in his proper Royalty and Virtues, casting up the general and particular Notions of a good King and happy Government; then peruse what was wanting in him.

First then, There is necessarily required proper to Empire, Wisdom, Justice, Fortitude, Beauty, Magnificence, Temperance, and Piety.

That he had Wisdom and Prudence, need no other witness, than his wise and provident managing, both of his own private Affairs and Government of the Publick. Also in the military Actions, in which he was try'd, both as a Subject and a King; his Adversaries can allow him to be a wise, prudent, politick, and heroical Prince; his Wisdom appearing with his Justice, very clearly in the good Laws he made, acknowledg'd and honourably predicated by our Reverend and most Learned Professors of the Laws.

For his further knowledge and love of Justice, there can be no fairer Argument than his Desire and Custom to sit in the Courts of Justice, hearing and distributing Justice indifferently to all

Justice Shelly commendeth the Laws of K. Rich. 3. to Cardinal Woolsey. Vide Joh. Stow in H. Men. 8. p. 882. Chron. MS. in Quarto, apud Dom. K. Cotton.

And when he made his Progress into Yorkshire, being inform'd there of some Extortioners and foul Offenders, who were apprehended, not tried, he caus'd the Law to take the just current, giving strict Charge and Commandment to all Officers of Justice, for just Administration to all Men, without Partiality or private Respects.

The Fortitude and Magnanimity of this Prince (tho' low of Stature) were so great and famous, as they need no Trumpet or Præcony, being bred from his youth in martial Actions: And the Battels of Barnet, Exham, Doncaster; the second of St. Albans and of Tewksbury, will give him the reputation of a Souldier and Captain.

Being made General of the King's Armies into Scotland, he prevail'd happily in his Expedition, and particularly recover'd that famous and strong Hold of Berwick, which King Henry VI. had so weakly let go.

And in this you shall hear the Elogy of One that was loth to speak much in his favour, yet occasion forc'd him to speak his knowledge, tho' coldly and sparingly; "King Richard was no ill Captain in the War; he had sundry Victories, and sometimes Overthrows, but never by his own Default, for want of Hardiness or Politick Order. Whereunto he addeth, concerning his Bounty; "Free, was he call'd, of Dispencc, and Liberal somewhat above his power. To which I will add one Elogy more, above all for credit and authority, recorded in an Act of Parliament, and address'd to him in the name of the whole High Court of Parliament, in these Words; "We consider your great Wit, Prudence, Justice, and Courage; and we know by experience, the memorable and laudable Acts done by you in several Battels for the Salvation and Defence of this Realm.

Here followeth another general and memorable Testimony of him, and of more regard and honour, because it is averr'd by One that knew him from his Youth, the Duke of Buckingham, who (after Richard was made King, and this Duke became ill affected) acknowledg'd to Bp. Morton, in private Speeches between them, (a) "That he thought King Richard, from his first knowledge even to that time, a Man clean without Dissimulation, tractable, and without Injury; and that for these Respects he was very desirous to advance him, and labour'd earnestly to make him Protector. Therefore, whatsoever the Duke said after in reproach of the King, it may justly be thought to proceed from Spleen and Malice.

There is this Commendation of his Eloquence and pleasing Speech; which tho' no Regal Virtue, yet it is an Ornament to the greatest Princes and commendable. The Prior of Croyland repeating the Dispute of a Controversie between the two Brothers, George Duke of Clarence and this Richard of Gloucester, at the Council-Table before the King their Brother, sitting in his Chair of State, relates it thus:

That is,

"A Dispute arising betwixt the two Dukes, being Brothers, so many pregnant Reasons were adduced by them on either Side, in the Presence of the King, sitting in his Chair of State in the Council Chamber, that all who were there, even such as were well skill'd in the Laws, did admire that fluency of Speech which the Princes had in Readiness in their own Cause, &c.

Then speaking of the excellent Wits, extraordinary Knowledge and Gifts of these three Brothers, maketh this honourable Præcony: Hi tres Germani, Rex, & duo Duces, tam excellenti ingenio valebant, ut si discordare non voluissent, suum ille triplex difficillime rumperetur. i. e.

(a) His kissing the two young Princes when they were deliver'd up to him by their Mother, and his shewing his wither'd Arm as he with'd, are no great Proofs of his Sincerity.

" These three Brothers, the King, and the " two Dukes, were of a Wit so excellling, that " if they had not disagreed amongst themselves,
" such a threefold Cord cou'd not, without the
" greatest difficulty, have been broken afunder.

Let us look upon his charitable, religious and magnificent Works.

He founded a Collegiate Church of Priests in Middicham in Yorkshire; another College of Priests in London in Tower-street, near to the Church call'd Our Lady Berking. He built a Church or Chapel in Towton in Gloucestershire, a Monument of his Thankfulness to Almighty God, for the happy and great Victory his Brother had upon the Partisans of the Family of Lancaster, and the Sons of Henry VI. who before slew Richard Duke of York, King designate, and Father of these two Kings.

He founded a College in York, convenient for the Entertainment of an Hundred Priests.

Richard

He disforested a great part of the Forest of Wickwood, and other vast Woods between Woodstock and Bristow, for the Good and Benefit of the People of Oxfordshire and the Places adjacent.

He built the high Stone Tower at Westminster, (which at this Day is a Work of good use.) And when he had repair'd and fortify'd the Castle of Carlisle, he founded and built the Castle of Penrith in Cumberland.

He manumifed many Bond-men.

In Rot. in

Ann. 1. R.

For the better encouragement of the Easter-ling-Hanfes (their Trade being beneficial and profitable to this Kingdom) he granted them some good Privileges, as Polidor writeth.

Charles
the Great instituted the College and Society of Armors calling them He-rals of Arms and Halten, (Dutch or Franchis words)
and not of Hero's.

He also first founded the College and Society of Heralds, and made them a Corporation; and (as the words in the Charter are) he ordain'd it, Ut sint in perpetuum Corpus Corporatum in re & nomine, habeant Successionem perpetuam, &c. (a taste of his love to Honour, and his noble Care for the conservation of Nobility, Chevalry and Gentry.) Which Corporation this King esta-blish'd by his Royal Charter, and plac'd the Heralds in an ancient fair House, which was call'd Yorkime sometimes, after commonly Cole-barbour, situate upon the Thames; ordaining four Kings at Arms, by the Names and Titles of John Writb, Garter; Thomas Holme, Clarenceux; John Moor, Norway; and Richard Champney, Gloucester.

For Wales, I have seen the Charter wherewith the King created first Richard Champney, Esq; King at Arms, by the Title and Name of Gloucester, dated Anno 1. R. III. at Westminster, in the Month of March, when the Charter of the Foundation was granted.

He further establish'd, That these four Kings at Arms and the rest of the Heralds, who are in the Charter call'd Heraldi & Prosecutores sive Pursuandis, should lodge, live and common together, in that House, where the Rolls, Monuments and Writings (appertaining to the Office and Art of Heraldry and Armory) should be kept; giving also Lands and Tenements for the perpetual maintaining of a Chaplain or Chantry Priest, to say and sing Service every Day, and to pray for the King, Queen and Prince, and for their Souls when they were dead.

Lastly, He gave sundry good Privileges and Immunities to the said Corporation: Which Charter was kept continually in the Office until within these few Years, but now is in another place: The want of it importeth nothing, being the Duplicate is upon Record in the Archives, kept in the Convert-house, now call'd the Rolls. 1485.

It was confirm'd by the Parliament, and dated 2°. die Martii, anno Regni primo, apud Westmonasterium, Baron: And underneath was written, Per breve de privato Sigillo, de datu predicto, autoritati Parliamenti.

He also built or repair'd some part of the Tower of London towards the Thames; in memory whereof, there be yet his Arms impaled with those of the Queen his Wife, standing upon the Arch adjoyning to the Sluce-gate.

He began many other good Works, which his sudden Fate prevented; as Polidor thus witnesseth.

Richardus Tertius multa opera publica & priva-ta inchoavit, quæ immatura morte præceptus non perfecit. Which Works and Monuments of Piety shew not the Acts of a Tyrant. Polidor Virgil, being neither Yorkist nor Lancastrian, speaks much in commendation of his pious and charitable Disposition; to which I refer the Readers, and put it to their indifferent Judgments, How many of those call'd Good Kings, have exceeded him in their longer and prosperous Time, being in quiet possession too of their Crown and Kingdoms? Let me add for a Corollary, what that of the worthy Prelate Archibald Lubitlaw (Chief Secretary, and a Privy Councillor of Scotland) in his Oration, when he was One of the Commissioners for a conclusion of a Peace and Marriage between Prince James, eldest Son to the King of Scotland, and the Lady Ann, Daughter to John de la Poole; from whence I have collected these.

Serenissime Princeps,

UNA me res consolatur, & juvat, tua (scil.) in omni virtutū genere celeberrima fama per omnem Orbis terrarum ambitum disseminata, tuæ etiam innatæ benignitatis clarissima præstantq; humanitas, tuæ mansuetudo, liberalitas, fides, summa justitia, incredibilis animi magnitudo, tua non humana, sed pene divina sapientia, te non modo singulis facilem, verum vulgo & popularibus affabilem præbes & quibus virtutibus altæque prudentiæ cuncta & pronunciata & dicta in meliora commutata. Serenissimus Princeps Rex Scotorum, Dominus meus, qui te alto amore profe-quitur, te desiderat, tuam, amicitiam & affinitatem affectat, supra captum cogitationis meæ; si quid a me erratum erit, tuis & divinis virtutibus, quibus commercium cum Cælestibus numinibus & societatem contraxeris, tribuendum putato.

Faciem tuam summo Imperio & Principatu dignam in- Richardus spicit, quam moralis & Heroica virtus illustrat, de te dici fuit statupredicarique potest quod Thebanorum Principi inclitissimo ra parva.
Poeta his verbis attribuit.

Nanquam tantum animum natura minori corpore, nec tantas visa est includere vires. Major in exiguo regnabat corpore virtus. In te enim sunt rei militaris, virtus, perititia, felicitas, & autoritas, quæ omnia in optimo exercitus principe Cicero requirit.

In te (Serenissime Princeps) præclari Regis & Imperatoris præcepta ita concurrunt, ut nihil ad tuam Bellicam, aut domesticam virtutem cujusquam oratoris virbis apponi possit.

Tu igitur (Serenissime Domine & Princeps) de ineunda inter te & nostrum Principem charitate & amicitia, sic age, ut Angli & Scoti dilectionis respectu nullum penitus discrimen habeatur, sed in unum amoris & benevolentie vinculum videantur esse comexi, sic numerabiles commoditates ex tui, & nostri populi delectatione, dulci connubio, unione, Matrimonio, & Affinitate consurgant.

Most Serene Prince,

“ ONE thing is to me at this time favourable and encouraging, which is your Majesty's most high Renown in every Kind of excell'g Qualities, extended even into the remotest Corners of the World ; also the most illustrious and surpassing Excellency of your innate Goodness and Generosity, your Clemency, Liberality, Truth, great Justice, Magnanimity surpassing Belief, your not human, but almost divine Wisdom ; you shew your self gentle to all, and affable, even to the meanest of your People ; by which Virtues, and by your great Prudence, whatever is spoken and pronounc'd is by your Majesty favourably construed and accepted. The most Serene Prince the K. of the Scots, my Master, out of the high Love and Esteem he has for your Majesty, is desirous of your Friendship and Alliance, even beyond what I am able to express ; the Faults that I may chance to commit, they find a Cause as well as an Excuse in your Divine Virtues, whereby you are become like unto, and are, as it were, entred into the Society of, the celestial Inhabitants.

“ He beholds in your Face a princely Majesty and Authority Royal, sparkling with the illustrious Beams of all Moral and Heroical Virtues. To you may not unfitly be apply'd, what was said by the Poet of a most renowned Prince of the Thebans ;

—So great a Soul, such Strength of Mind
Sage Nature ne'r to a less Body joyn'd.

“ For in your Majesty are Military Prowess, Skill, Success, and Authority ; all which are by Cicero requir'd in an able General of an Army.

“ In you (most Serene Prince) all the Excellent Qualifications of a Good King and Great Commander are happily united, insomuch, that to the Perfection of your Military and Civil Accomplishments, nothing could be added, even by the highest Rhetorical Flights of a most consummate Orator.

“ You therefore (most Serene Prince) will be pleas'd in your Royal Wisdom, to take such Measures, upon your Part, for establishing a Love and Friendship betwixt you and our Prince, that with respect to mutual Love, the Difference betwixt an English and a Scottish Man may not henceforth be remembred, but both Nations may be united by the Bond of Love and Benevolence. So, from the Love, sweet Agreement, Union, Alliance, and as it were Marriage of your People and these of ours, unto both innumerable Advantages shall accrue.

“ While Clouds to th' Sea do roul, and Mountains high “ Cast fable Shades, Stars sparkle in the Sky, “ Wild Boars on Hills, Fish wanton in the Streams,

“ Bees feed on Thyme, at Titan's later Beams “ Locusts on Dew, your high renowned Name “ Shall ever live, and fly on Wings of Fame.

But what is this, or more, to Malice and Detraction, that haunt him to his Death ; and after that, making the Catastrophe, or last tragical Act of his Life at Bosworth-field, an immediate Stroke of the Divine Vengeance, for such Offences as they please to particular from Women or superstitious Clerks, whose Natures startle at the noise of War and Martial Trial, to whose Fears and Weakness such Reasons would sound tolerable. But if Bishop Morton and Sir Thomas Moor (altho' they were Men of the long Robe) had consider'd with whom they conversed, and where they most liv'd ; how could they forget, that to Die valiantly in the Field, for Country, Life and Friends, was always held a glorious Farewel to the World ; or what infinite numbers of virtuous and most noble Captains have fallen so by the Sword and fate of War.

Lampridius affirmeth, That all the best Men have died violent Deaths : And what higher Quarrel could call any heroical Spirit, than King Richard's fighting for a Crown, Kingdom, and all his happy Fortunes here ? God hath many times taken away Princes, and changed the Government of Kingdoms for the Iniquities of the People ; why then should not King Richard's Fate be held in a modest Scale until we can better know or judge it ? Nor can it be safe to enquire, or peremptorily to determine further after God's Proceedings in such Cases. He that owes him no Malice (things look'd upon thro' judgment and charity) may with more justice say, He died valiantly and in a just Quarrel, when many of his Enemies fell by Death's more vile, and shameful Executions.

But he that hath but a reasonable pittance of Humanity, will censure no Man's Life by the manner of his Death ; for many good and holy Men have suffer'd by violent Deaths ; tho' it be this Prince's fortune to fall under the ill Affections of envious Pens, more than many that committed more publick and prov'd Crimes than he, which wanted much of his Virtues and Desert.

Examine him with Henry I. the good Clerk and learned Prince, but so covetous and ambitious, that he could not be content to usurp in this Kingdom the Right and Primogeniture of his elder Brother Robert Courthouse, but by force took the Dukedom of Normandy from him : And to make his Injuries more exact and monstrous, cast him into the Castle of Gloucester, there kept him in cruel Durance, and caused his Eyes to be put out ; so wearied him to most miserable Death.

King John, by the general voice, is charg'd with the Murder of Arthur Plantagenet, the Son of his eldest Brother, and so the next Prince in right of Blood to King Richard I.

And it is written by good Authors, That Edward III. was not only privy and consenting to the deposing the King his Father (a King anointed) but also to his Massacre. And because Edward Plantagenet Earl of Kent, Protector, and his Uncle, moved him to restore the Crown to his Father Edward II. he call'd him Traytor, and cut off his Head at Westminster.

How King Henry IV. caused King Richard II. (the true and anointed King) to be cruelly butcher'd at Pomfret, is too notorious ; and this was Scelera sceleribus tueri.

King Edward IV. is accused of the Murder and Death of the King Saint Henry, and of Edward Prince of Wales his Son. (Ut supra)

Grafton.
head.

This Prince Philip was by cross Fortune put into the King's Hands: Purposing out of Flanders to go into Spain, with the Queen his Wife, took Shipping at Sluce, and passing by the Coasts of England, was by a Tempest forced for his Safety to put into the Port of Weymouth in Dorsetshire: The Queen being ill, and distemper'd much with the Storm, was compell'd to make some stay there.

Sir John Carew, and Sir Thomas Trenchard (principal Men in those Parts) gave speedy Intelligence of this to the King, who was glad of the Accident, and purpos'd to make good use of it, as speedily returning his Command to give them all honourable Entertainment; but not suffer them to depart, until he had seen and saluted them.

The Duke ignorant of this, as soon as the Queen and the rest had recover'd and refresh'd themselves, thought he was only to give those Knights Thanks, and take his Leave; which they by way of courtesie and request interpose, in behalf of the King's vehement desire to salute him and the Queen: a Motion the Duke much preft to be excus'd from, as the Necessity of his Journey stood; but the Intreaty was so imperious, he must stay, and alter his Journey for Windsor, to meet the King, who received him there in a Magnificent manner; and at the height of a Feast, propounds a Suit to the Duke for Edmund de la Pool (then in his Dominions) a Pretender to the Crown of England, and not so soundly affected to him: A Suit of a harsh Exposition, as the Duke apprehended it, and to the blemish of his Honour and Piety, as he nobly urg'd: but no Argument had Vertue, nor no Vertue Argument enough to excuse it; the King must have him, or the Duke must stay. Cast upon this Extream (and foreseeing what Disadvantages were upon him, some honourable Conditions granted, that he should neither lay Punishment nor Death upon him) he gave his Promise to send him, and the King strictly and religiously bound himself to the Exceptions.

The Duke accordingly sent this de la Pool into England; who upon his Arrival was deliver'd to the Tower; but his Life not toucht until the King lay a Dying; then he equivocated his Vow by a Mental Reservation, enjoyning his Son after his Death to cut off his Head; which was done when he came to be King, and was held some taint to them both; though the Son held himself acquit and warranted by the Example of King Solomon, who was made the Instrument of such another subtil Slaughter by his Father David, that thought he kept himself by Equivocation: Examples not to be imitated by any Christian Prince, being a Sin; and Sins are to be avoided, not imitated.

The eldest Brother of these de la Pools, John de la Pool, Heir to the Duke of Suffolk, and Head of this Family, was Slain casually at the Battel of Stoke; and is he who, as nearest Kinsman to King Richard III. was Proclaim'd Heir apparent. The Sister of these Princely de la Pools, the Lady Katharine, was kept close Prisoner in the Tower, until Grief and Sorrow bowed her to the Grave.

Grafton.

Nor is it much from our Purpose to note, that the chief Plantagenets, namely, the Children of King Edward IV. had but cold Influences then; for the Lady Bridget was thrust into a Nunnery at Darford, chiefly (as it was thought) that she should live Sterile, and die without Issue. The Lady Cecily was married to a base Fellow, that so her Issue might be ignoble and contemptible; the Wrong being the greater, in regard she was offer'd Matches to her Quality; the King of Scotland propounding Prince James unto her; and the French King Lewis demanded her for the Dauphin Charles of France.

It was observed too, That this King was but an Unkind and Severe Husband to his Queen (indeed:) they had all but short Lives; and our Stories report he pick'd a Quarrel with the Queen Dowager-Mother, for an old and venial Errour, because she deliver'd her Son Richard to the Protector; for which there was a Confiscation upon all her Goods, Chattels and Revenues, and she confin'd to Bermondsey-Abbey, where she liv'd not long, Care and Grief twisting the Thread of her sad Fate. And when Death had seized him from all the Glories and Policies of this World, his Son succeeds; and then, Residuum Locusta, Bruchus comedit; & residuum Bruchi comedit Rubigo: for, what remain'd of the House of York, he gave the last blow to: and after the dispatch of the aforefaid Edmund de la Pool, caus'd the Lady Margaret Plantagenet Countess of Salisbury, then Daughter and Heir of George Duke of Clarence, to be Attainted of Treason by Act of Parliament, and condemn'd Unheard being dragged to the Block barbarously by the Hair of her Head, tho' above Threescore Years in Age, Anno 3; H8. Not long after, Sir Henry Pool her eldest Son was put to Death, and her Son Reynold Pool was attainted of Treason with her (no Man knowing what the Treason was) but got suddenly out of the Kingdom into Italy, where he became much favoured by the Princes there, and by the Popes afterward made Cardinal, and highly renowned (in those Times) for his Learning, Piety and other noble Merits. Richard Pool, another Son of the Countess of Salisbury, fled, and liv'd a banish'd Man in foreign Countries; yet at the height of a good Reputation, until he was Slain at the Battel of Pavia.

These be sad Pauses, which my Pen but touches at, to note the Partiality of some on one side, and the Malignity of some on the other side, who have made King Richard the worst of all Princes; when other of our own have had as great an Appetite of Empire, whose Fames and sacred Names we gratulate with Honour.

Nor let my just and plain Meaning be mistaken, which urges nothing in Dislike or Exprobation that King Henry the Seventh had the Crown, whom our Age must acknowledge a Wife, Provident and Religious Prince, The Restorer of the ancient Line of the British Kings to their Reign and Kingdom, Nephew of King Henry the Sixth by his Grandmother Queen Katharine, Widow of King Henry the Fifth, and Mother of King Henry the Sixth, and of his Brother Uterine Edmund Teudor Earl of Richmond, the Father of this King Henry the Seventh; and so he was Nephew also to Charles the Seventh King of France. I only conceive he took it by too violent a hand, not staying temper bene placiti.

And here I may fitly take occasion to make up a Defect or Brack covertly imputed to the Titles of the Normans, and Princes of York, by our vulgar Historians and Chroniclers.

And first, we are to suppose, If there be, it grew by the Errour of King Edward's Marriage, by which they hold that Title was weakned (at the least blemish'd) but that could have no continuance, England.

And without that (if need were) our King now reigning hath other Royal Rights, more than funiculus Triplex; some more ancient, authentick and just, therefore more secured, and of more prosperous Hopes than that Norman Title, which was a violent acquist of the Sword, and a Purchase made by Blood, so consequently none of the Best; which was well conceived by that great Macedon, when he said, Non est diuturna possessio in quam gladio inducimur. Neither would it avail in this behalf to cite or avouch the Donation of this Kingdom, which the Confessor is said to have made to William the Conqueror, being to no Purpose, because that Gift or Legacy was disclaimed and disallow'd by the Barons of this Land, and found to be void.*

Alex. apud Curtium, lib. 8.

Yet Time now, and Prescription, have also made that Title good; for Prescription hath power to Ratify and Confirm the Titles both of Princes and of Private Men.

Clyto, that is, a Prince of the Blood.

But our King is the immediate and sole Lawful Heir of King Egbert, (who first gave the Name of England to this Land, and was absolute Lord of it) from him, by the glorious Kings, Edgar, Edmund, Athelstan, Alfred, and many others, as well Saxons and Angles, as Anglo-Saxons, the Right and Title of this Kingdom is duely descended and devolved to Edmund Ironside King of England, who was Father to the most Noble Clyto, Edward surnam'd Exul, whose fair Daughter and Heir (a religious Lady) the Princess Margaret of England, was married to Malcom Canmore King of Scotland; from which Ancient and happy Alliance, the King our Sovereign Lord is directly and certainly descended, and is the true and only Heir to the Rights and Titles which were without flaw; so the most ancient and famous Title, and Right of the first Kings of Britain are in him, being the next Heir of our last British King Henry Tudor, whose Genealogy I have seen derived from the Antick Kings of Britain, and from divers other British Princes. And this Henry Tudor (or the Seventh) to confirm all the Titles of this Kingdom unto his Claim, by the strongest and greatest Authority, procur'd them Decreed to him and to his Issue (so established in himself and his Posterity for ever) by Act of Parliament, in this manner and words.

Anno 1 H. 7. in Parliament in Novemb.

The Pleasure of Almighty God, and for the Wealth, and Prosperity, and Surety of this Realm of England, to the singular Comfort of all the Subjects of the same, and for avoiding all Ambiguities and Questions:

Be it Ordained, Established and Enacted by the Authority of this present Parliament, That the Inheritance of the Crown of the Realm of England, and also of France, with all the Pre-eminencies and Dignities Royal to the same appertaining, and all Liegances to the King belonging beyond the Seas, with the Appurtenances thereunto in any wise due or appertaining, To be, rest, remain and abide in the most Royal Person of our Sovereign Lord King Henry the Seventh, and in the Heirs of his Body lawfully coming perpetually, with the Grace of God, and so to endure, and in no other.

Which is also another Title to our King, Heir to Henry the Seventh.

And this Act was renew'd and firmly established, for our Sovereign Lord King James, Anno regni primo.

Yet King Henry the Seventh obtain'd of the Pope another Title, Jure Belli.

All which Titles and Rights (which ever were appertaining to this Kingdom, and to the Empire of Britain) are coalesced and met in our Sovereign King; for he hath not only the Claims of the ancient Kings of Britain, of the Saxons, and Anglo-Saxons Kings, and of the Norman Race; but also the Titles and Rights of the Royal Families of York, of Lancaster, and of Wales, &c.

And (not as the least, in reference with these) he hath in possession also, those singular and particular Monuments of Empire and Reign, by some call'd Fata Regni, and Instrumenta & Monumenta Regni, & Imperio destinata.

One being the Ring of the accounted Holy King Edward, the Son of King Etheldred, which was consecrated and extraordinarily blessed by St. John Baptist in Palestine, and sent back by the King (as old Writers tell) which hath been religiously kept in the Abbey of Westminster, and is (as Tradition goes) the Ring which the Archbishop of Canterbury at the Inauguration and Consecration of the Kings, puts upon their Finger; call'd in our Stories, The Wedding Ring of England.

The other Monument of the British Empire, is the Marble Stone whereupon Jacob laid his Head, when he had those Coelestial and Mystical Visions mention'd in Holy Writ; which Stone was brought out of Palestine into Ireland, and from thence carried into Scotland by King Kenneth; after translated to the City of Scone, and used for the Chair wherein the Kings fate at their Coronation; brought out of Scotland by Edward the First into England, as the best Historians of Scotland and England relate.

Heitor, Boetius lib. 4. Ex Geo. Buchan. Gul. Cambden.

That is, "The Marble Chair fatal to the Scottish Kings, and in which they used to sit when they were crown'd, was by King Edward I. removed from Scone to London, and placed in Westminster-Abbey, where it yet remains."

It is set or born in a Chair of Wood, and for a perpetual Honour (upon a Table hanging in the Chappel at Westminster) this is writ:

—Si quid habet veri vel Chronica cana, fidesue clauditur hac Cathedra, Nobilis ille lapis, — Ad caput, eximius Jacob quondam Patriarcha, Quem posuit cernens numina mirifica; Quem tulit à Scotis Edwardus primus, &c.

—If old Records say true, this Chair

That noble Stone inclos'd does bear,
On which the Patriarch did his Head recline
When he view'd Scenes all wondrous & divine;
This the first Edward did from Scotland bring.

George Buchanan saith, The People are seriously perswaded that in this Stone (which he calleth Lapidem Marmoreum rudem) the Fate of the Kingdom is contained, and that fatum Regni is thus understood; viz. What King of Scotland soever is Lord of that Stone, and Sovereignly possessed thereof, shall be King, and reign in

1485. in the Country where he findeth that Stone :
Thus told in a Prophetical Distich.

Ni fallat fatum, Scotus quocunque locatum Inveniet lapidem, regnare tenetur ibidem.

Unless old Saws do fail, and Wizzards Wits go blind,
The Scots shall have the Rule where e'er this Stone they find.

*Scotus primus Rex Scotie, ut
Anglus
Gallus Vispanus, Ecce pro Rege Anglie Galie Hispanie.*

Which Prophecy was accomplish'd in King James, when he came first into England: for his Titles were not only funiculus triplex qui difficile rumpitur; but also funiculus multiplex qui nunquam rumpitur. And may those Titles for ever be establish'd in his Loins, according to that of the Heavenly Messenger, Regnum perpe-tuum, & ejus non est finis. Amen.

Thus I have led you thorough the various Relations, and Tragical Interchanges of this Prince's Life, to his last Act and Place, where, (after Revenge and Rage had satiated their barbarous Cruelties upon his dead Body) they gave his Royal Earth a Bed of Earth, honourably, appointed by the Order of King Henry the Seventh, in the chief Church of Leicester, call'd
St. Maries, belonging to the Order and Society of the Grey Friars; the King in short time after causing a fair Tomb of mingled colour'd Marble, adorn'd with his Statue to be erected thereupon, to which some grateful Pen had also destined an Epitaph, the Copy whereof (never fixt to his Stone) I have seen in a recorded Manuscript-Book chain'd to a Table in a Chamber in the Guild-hall of London: which (the Faults and Corruptions being amended) is thus represented, together with the Title there-unto prefix'd as I found it.

Could this King be brought off from the horrid Imputation that lies upon his Memory, of much Bloodshed, Oppression and gross Hypocrisy, to gain and keep the Crown, one might judge him a good King. For in several Passages of his Reign, and Publick Declarations by him made, he express'd a Care of the good Estate of his People, and a Concern to have Sin and Wickedness checked, and carried himself with a Regard to Learning and Religion.
Here follow a few Instances.

Upon the hurting of a Constable of Gloucester in the Execution of his Office, the King taking particular Notice thereof, and of the Occasion, sent a Special Letter to the chief Officers there, Viz.

"RICHARD, &c. To the Maior, Sheriffs and Aldermen of our Town of Gloucester, that now be, or that hereafter for the time shal be, Greeting. Forasmuch as we wel understand, that by means of Retaindors, and receyving and wearyng of Lyveries, of clothing Baieux, and other Signes, contrary to the Effects of the Statutes by our Noble Progenitors heretofore ordeyned and establissh'd in that behalf, grete and manie Divyions and Inconveniences have ryfen and grown in dyvers places within this oure Realme, to the grete troubles and annoyance of oure Subjects of the same: And especiallie now of late among you within our said Towne by evyl dysposed Gentelmen, Jamys Gyse, John Burdet, Edmard Brigge, and others in making Affault upon oure Officers, a Constable of oure said Towne, not onely beaten and grevously maimed, but also partly in dyspairof his Lyfe, as it is to us shewed, to oure full grete dyspleasur. Wherefor We woll and charge you, that if ye have comytted them or any of them to Prison, yee do surely kepe them there without Bayle or Mainprize, to soche tyme as ye shal undre-stonde oure further pleasur in that behaulf. And if No, to endeavour you thereunto. And over thys, that yee in nowyse from henceforth suffre any Person dwellyng among you in oure said Town or Franchises, for to use or wear Lyvery of Clothyng bagien, signe or other Connizance, of the Gyft of any Maner of Person of whate State, Degree or Condition soever he be, but only Oures. And that upon the Peine of Forfeitures of their Lyberties, and Franchises. And if ye shal know any presuming, or attempting so to do, that yee forthwith without delay com-myt him in lykewise to sure Prison, and so remayne as above. Fayle yee not to accomplysh this at your uttermost peryl. Yeven at London the 6th of December.

For the checking of Vice and promoting of Sobriety and Vertue, both in Temporal and Spiritual Men, the King wrote this Circular Letter to the Bishops.

"Reverend Padre in God, Right Trustie and Welbeloved, We grete you wele; Ascertainyng you that amonges othre oure secular besynesces and Cares, oure principal Entent and fervent desire is to see vertue and clennes of Lyving to be avaunced, encreased and multiplied, and vices and all othre thyngs repugnant to vertue, provoking the high Indignation and fereful Displeasure of God, to be repressed and adnulled. And this perfetly followed and put in execution by Persones of high Estate, Pre-eminence & Dignitie not oonly enduceth Persones of lower degree to take therof example, and to ensue the same, but also thereby the great and infinite Goodnesse of God is made placable, and gracioussly enclyned to the exaudition of our Petitions and Prayers. And forasmuche as it is nota-rily knowen, that in every Jurisdiction, as wele in their Pastoral Cure, as othre, there be many, as wele of the Spirituell Partie, as of the Temporall, delyring from the true weye of vertue and good lyving to the pernicious example of othre, and lothesomnes of every weledisposed Person; WEE therefore woll and desire you, and on Goddess behalf inwardly exhort and require you, that according to the Charge of your Profession, ye woll see, within th' Auctoritie of your Jurisdiction, al suche Persones as set aparte Vertue and promote the dampnable execution of Sinne and Vices, to be reformed, repressed and punysshed condignely after their demerits; not sparing for any love, favour, drede or affection; whether th'offendour be Spirituel or Temporell. Wherein ye may be assured we shall yeve unto you oure favour, aide and assistance, if the Caas shall so require, and see to the sharpe Punysshment of the Repugnatours and Interruptours, if any suche be.

"And if ye woll diligently applie you to the execution and perfourmyng of this Matere, ye shall not oonly doo unto God right acceptable pleasure, but over that we shall see suche Persones Spirituell as ben undre your Pasto-rell Cure, noon otherwise to be entreated or punysshed for their Offenses, but according to the Ordenaunces and Lawes of holy Church. And if for the due execution of the Premises any Complaint or Subgection be made unto us of you, We shall remytte the determynation therof unto the Courts of our Cousin tharchebishop of Canterbury Cardinal. And thus proceeding to the execution hereof, ye shal doo unto your Self grete honour, and unto us right singler pleasure. Yeven, &c. at Westmynster the X. day of Mareche.

And his Care of the good Government and Ease of his Subjects, part of his Proclamation against his Rebels in Kent wil shew; Viz.

"And over this, the Kinges Highness is fully determyned to se due Administration of Justice throughout this commaundement for their Delivery. ¶ 5.

To

1485. To give you him in his equal Draught and Composition: He was of a mean or low Compact, but without Disproportion and Unevenness either in Lineaments or Parts (as his several Pictures present him) His Aspect had most of the Soldier in it; So his Natural Inclination (Complexions not uncertainly expounding our Dispositions) but what wants of the Court-Planet, Effeminate Censurers think must needs be harsh and crabbed (and Envy will pick Quarrels with an Hair, rather than want Subject). The Judgment and Courage of his Sword-Actions, rendred him of a full Honour and Experience, which Fortune gratify'd with many Victories; never any Overthrows through his own Default, for lack of Valour or Policy. At

by the Order, and at the Expence of King Henry the Seventh.

I Who am lay'd beneath this Marble Stone,
Richard the Third, possess'd the British Throne;
My Country's Guardian in my Nephew's Claim,
By Trust betray'd I to the Kingdom came.
Two Years and sixty Days, save two, I reign'd,
And bravely strove in Fight, but unsustain'd
My English left me in the luckless Field,
Where I to Henry's Arms was forc'd to yield.
Yet at his Charge, my Coarse this Tomb obtains
Who piously interr'd me, and ordains
That Regal Honours wait a King's Remains.
Th' Year fourteen hundred 'twas & eighty four
The twenty first of August, when its Pow'r
And all its Rights I did to the Red Rose restore.

Epigram on the Three Richards, Kings of England; the Latin transcrib'd from an Old Manuscript.

Three Richards did in England wear the Crown;
An equal Fortune in the three was shown;
All Childless dy'd, and left no Race behind,
Rapacious were their Lives, to Force alike inclin'd;
Their Deaths were violent. The first excell'd
The Rest in Fame, and * Triumphs of the Field,
Returning home, he on a foreign Plain
Was by the fatal Darts of Archers slain.
The Second was from Sov'reign Sway depos'd.
For several Months in strict Confinement clos'd,
He chose to Starve, rather than see his Shame,
And bear the Insults of reproaching Fame.
The Third profusely spent the treasur'd Store
That Edward rais'd, but when with warlike Pow'r
To crush brave Henry's Partisans he try'd,
Wounded in Fight, he fell himself and dy'd.
Thus the Red Roses, their Opposers slain, Reviv'd and flourish'd in the World again.

AFTER that Richard the Third of that Name, King in Fact only, but Tyrant both in Title and Regiment, and so commonly termed and reputed in all Times since, was by the Divine Revenge, favouring the Design of an exil'd Man, Overthrown and Slain at Bosworth Field: There succeeded in the Kingdom the Earl of Richmond, thenceforth styl'd Henry the Seventh. The King immediately after the Victory, as one that had been bred under a devout Mother, and was in his Nature a great Observer of Religious Forms, caused Te Deum Laudamus to be solemnly sung in the presence of the whole Army upon the place, and was himself with general Applause and great Cries of Joy, in a Kind of Militar Election or Recognition, saluted King. Mean while the Body of Richard after many Indignities and Reproaches (the Dirigies and Obsequies of the common People towards Tyrants) was obscurely buried. For tho' the King of his Nobleness gave Charge unto the Friars of Leicester to see an honourable Interrment to be given to it, yet the Religious People themselves (being not free from the Humours of the Vulgar) neglected it; wherein nevertheless they did not then incur any Man's Blame or Censure. No Man thinking any Ignominy or Contumely unworthy of him, that had been the Executioner of King Henry VI. (that Innocent Prince) with his own Hands; the Contriver of the Death of the Duke of Clarence, his Brother; the Murderer of his two Nephews (one of them his lawful King in the Present, and the other in the Future, failing of him) and vehemently suspected to have been the Impoisoner of his Wife, thereby to make Vacant his Bed, for a Marriage within the Degrees forbidden. And altho' he were a Prince in Militar Vertue approv'd, Jealous of the Honour of the English Nation, and likewise a good Law-maker, for the Ease and Solace of the common People: Yet his Cruelties and Parricides in the Opinion of all Men, weigh'd down his Vertues and Merits; and in the Opinion of wise Men, even those Vertues themselves were conceived to be rather feign'd, and affected things to serve his Ambition, than true Qualities ingenerate in his Judgment or Nature. And therefore it was noted by Men of great Understanding (who seeing his after Acts, look'd back upon his former Proceedings) that even in the Time of King Edward his Brother, he was not without secret Trains and Mines to turn Envy and Hatred upon his Brother's Government; as having an Expectation and a kind of Divination, that the King, by reason of his many Disorders, could not be of long Life, but was like to leave his Sons of tender Years; and then he knew well how easie a Step it was from the Place of a Protector, and first Prince of the Blood, to the Crown. And that out of this deep Root of Ambition it sprang, that as well at the Treaty of Peace that passed between Edward IV. and Lewis XI. of France, concluded by Interview of both Kings at Piqueny, as upon all other Occasions, Richard then Duke of Gloucester, stood ever upon the Side of Honour, raising his own Reputation to the Disadvantage of the King his Brother, and drawing the Eyes of all (especially of the Nobles and Soldiers) upon himself; as if the King by his Voluptuous Life and mean Marriage, were become Effeminate and less sensible of Honour and Reason of State, than was fit for a King. And as for the Politick and wholsome Laws which were enacted in his Time, they were interpreted to be but the Brocade of an Usurper, thereby to wooe and win the Hearts of the People, as being conscious to himself, that the true Obligations of Sovereignty in him failed, and were wanting. But King Henry in the very Entrance of his Reign, and the instant of time, when the Kingdom was cast into his Arms, met with a Point of great Difficulty and knotty to solve, able to trouble and confound the wisest King in the newness of his Estate; and so much the more, because it could not endure a Deliberation, but must be at once deliberated and determined.

There were fallen to his lot, and concurrent to his Person, three several Titles to the Imperial Crown; the first, the Title of the Lady Elizabeth, with whom, by precedent Pact with the

The third, the Title of the Sword, or Conquest, for that he came in by Victory of Battel, and that the King in possession was slain in the Field. The first of these was fairest, and most like to give Contentment to the People, who by Two and Twenty Years Reign of King Edward IV. had been fully made capable of the Clearness of the Title of the White Rose, or House of York; and by the mild and plausible Reign of the same King toward his later Time, were become affectionate to that Line. But then it lay plain before his Eyes, that if he relied upon that Title, he could be but a King at courtesy; and have rather a matrimonial than a regal Power; the Right remaining in his Queen; upon whose Decease, either with Issue, or without Issue, he was to give place and be removed. And tho' he should obtain by Parliament to be continued, yet he knew there was a very great difference between a King that holdeth his Crown by a Civil Act of Estates, and One that holdeth it originally by the Law of Nature and Descent of Blood. Neither wanted there even at that time, secret Rumours and Whisperings (which afterwards gather'd strength, and turn'd to great Troubles) that the two young Sons of King Edward IV. or one of them (which were said to be destroy'd in the Tower) were not indeed murder'd, but convey'd secretly away, and were yet living: Which if it had been true, had prevented the Title of the Lady Elizabeth. On the other side, if he stood upon his own Title of the House of Lancaster, inherent in his Person, he knew it was a Title condemn'd by Parliament, and generally pre-judg'd in the common Opinion of the Realm, and that it tended directly to the Disinheritance of the Line of York, held then the indubiate Heirs of the Crown. So that if he should have no Issue by the Lady Elizabeth, which should be Discendants of the Double Line, then the ancient Flames of Discord and intestine Wars upon the Competition of both Houses, would again return and revive.

As for Conquest, notwithstanding Sir William Stanley, after some Acclamations of the Soldiers in the Field, had put a Crown of Ornament (which Richard wore in the Battel, and was found among the Spoils) upon King Henry's Head, as if there were his chief Title; yet he remember'd well upon what Conditions and Agreements he was brought in; and that to claim as Conqueror, was to put as well his own Party, as the rest, into Terror and Fear; as that which gave him power of disannulling of Laws, and disposing of Men's Fortunes and Estates, and the like Points of absolute Power, being in themselves so harsh and odious, as that William himself, commonly call'd the Conqueror, howsoever he used and exercised the Power of a Conqueror to reward his Normans, yet he forbore to use that Claim in the beginning, but mixed it with a titular Pretence, grounded upon the Will and Designation of Edward the Confessor. But the King, out of the Greatness of his own Mind, presently cast the Die, and the Inconveniencies appearing unto him on all parts; and knowing there could not be any Inter-reign, or Suspension of Title; and preferring his Affection to his own Line and Blood; and liking that Title best that made him independent; and being in his Nature and Constitution of Mind not very apprehensive or forecasting of future Events afar off, but an Enter-tainer of Fortune by the Day, resolv'd to rest upon the Title of Lancaster as the main, and to use the other two, that of Marriage and that of Battel, but as Supporters; the one to appease secret Discontents, and the other to beat down open Murmur and Dispute; not forgetting that the same Title of Lancaster had formerly maintain'd a possession of Three Descents in the Crown, and might have proved a Perpetuity, had it not ended in the Weakness and Inability of the last Prince. Whereupon the King presently, that very Day, being the 22th of August, assumed the Stile of King in his own Name, without mention of the Lady Elizabeth at all, or any relation thereunto; in which Course he ever after persisted, which did spin him a Thread of many Seditions and Troubles. The King full of these Thoughts, before his Departure from Leicester, dispatch'd Sir Robert Willoughby to the Castle of Sheriff-Hutton in Yorkshire, where were kept in safe Custody, by K. Richard's Commandment, both the Lady Elizabeth, Daughter of King Edward, and Edward Plantagenet, Son and Heir to George Duke of Clarence. This Edward was, by the King's War-rant deliver'd from the Constable of the Castle to the Hand of Sir Robert Willoughby, and by him, with all safety and diligence, convey'd to the Tower of London, where he was shut up close Prisoner: Which Act of the King's (being an Act merely of Policy and Power) proceeded not so much from any apprehension he had of Doctor Shaw's Tale at Paul's-Cross, for the bastarding of Edward the Fourth's Issues, in which case this young Gentleman was to succeed (for that Fable was ever exploded) but upon a settled Dis-position to depress all Eminent Persons of the Line of York; wherein, still the King out of strength of Will, or weakness of Judgment, did use to shew a little more of the Party than of the King.

For the Lady Elizabeth she received also a Direction to repair with all convenient speed to London, and there to remain with the Queen Dowager her Mother; which accordingly she soon after did, accompanied with many Noblemen and Ladies of Honour. In the mean Season the King set forwards by easy Journeys to the City of London, receiving the Acclamations and Applauses of the People as he went, which indeed were true and unfeigned, as might well appear in the very Demonstrations and Fulness of the Cry: For they thought generally, that he was a Prince as ordain'd and sent down from Heaven, to unite and put to an end the long Dissension of the two Houses; which altho' they had in the Times of Henry IV. Henry V. and part of Henry VI. on the one side, and the Times of Edward IV. on the other, lucid Intervals and happy Pauses; yet they did ever hang over the Kingdom, ready to break forth into new Perturbations and Calamities. And as his Victory gave him the Knee, so his Purpose of Marriage with the Lady Elizabeth gave him the Heart; so that both Knee and Heart did truly bow before him.

He on the other side with great Wisdom (not ignorant of the Affections and Fears of the People) to disperse the Conceit and Terror of a Conquest, had given order that there should be nothing in his Journey like unto a warlike March or Manner, but rather like unto the Progress of a King in full Peace and Assurance.

He entred into the City upon a Saturday, as he had also obtain'd the Victory upon a Saturday, which Day of the Week, first upon an Obser-

Why K.
Hen. entered London in a close Chariot.

The Mayor and Companies of the City receiv'd him at Shore-ditch; whence, with great and honourable Attendance and Troops of Noblemen, and Persons of Quality he entred the City; himself not being on Horseback, or in any Open Chair, or Throne, but in a Close Chariot, as One that having been sometimes an Enemy to the whole State, and a proscrib'd Person, chose rather to keep State, and strike a Reverence into the People then to fawn upon them.

He went first into St. Paul's Church, where not meaning that the People should forget too soon that he came in by Battel, he made Offer-tory of his Standards, and had Orisons and Te Deum again sung, and went to his Lodging prepared in the Bishop of London's Palace, where he stay'd for a time.

During his abode there, he assembled his Council and other principal Persons, in presence of whom he did renew again his Promise to marry with the Lady Elizabeth. This he did the rather, because, having at his coming out of Brittaine given artificially, for serving of his own Turn, some Hopes, in case he obtain'd the Kingdom, to marry Anne Inheretress to the Dutchy of Brittaine, whom Charles the Eighth of France soon after married; it bred some doubt and suspicion amongst divers that he was not sincere, or at least not fix'd in going on with the Match of England so much desir'd: Which Conceit also, tho' it were but Talk and Discourse, did much afflict the poor Lady Elizabeth her self. But, howsoever he both truly intended it, and desired also it should be so believ'd, (the better to extinguish Envy and Contradiction to his other Purposes) yet was he resolv'd in himself not to proceed to the Consummation thereof till his Coronation and a Parliament were past; the one, least a joynt Coronation of himself and his Queen might give any Countenance of participation of Title; the other, least in the intailing of the Crown to himself, which he hoped to obtain by Parliament, the Votes of the Parliament might any ways reflect upon her.

Sweating Sickness.

About this time, in Autumn, towards the end of September, there began and reign'd in the City and other Parts of the Kingdom, a Disease then new; which of the Accidents and Manner thereof, they call'd the Sweating Sickness. This Disease had a swift Course both in the Sick Body and in the Time and Period of the lasting thereof: For they that were taken with it, upon Four and Twenty Hours escaping, were thought almost assur'd: And as to the Time of the Malice and Reign of the Disease ere it ceased; it began about the 21st of September, and clear'd up before the end of October; inso-much as it was no hindrance to the King's Coronation, which was the Last of October; nor (which was more) to the holding of the Parliament, which began but Seven Days after. It was a pestilent Fever, but as it seem'd not seated in the Veins or Humours, for that their follow'd no Carbuncle, no purple or livid Spots, or the like, the Mass of the Body being not tainted; only a malign Vapour flew to the Heart, and seized the vital Spirits; which stirr'd Nature to strive to send it forth by an extreme Sweat. And it appear'd by experience that this Disease was rather a Surprise of Nature, than obstinate to Remedies, if it were in time look'd unto: For if the Patient were kept in an equal Temper, both for Cloaths, Fire, and

Its Cure.

Drink moderately warm, with temperate Cordials, whereby Nature's Work were neither irritated by Heat, nor turn'd back by Cold, he commonly recover'd. But infinite Persons died suddenly of it, before the manner of the Cure and Attendance was known. It was conceiv'd not to be an Epidemick Disease, but to proceed from a Malignity in the Constitution of the Air, gathered by the Pre-dispositions of Seasons; and the speedy Cessation declared as much.

On Simon and Jude's Even the King dined with Thomas Bourchier, Archbishop of Canterbury and Cardinal; and from Lambeth went by Land over the Bridge to the Tower, where the Morrow after he made Twelve Knights-Bannerets. But for Creations he dispensed them with a sparing Hand: For notwithstanding a Field so lately fought, and a Coronation so near at hand, he only created Three: Jasper Earl of Pembroke (the King's Uncle) was created Duke of Bedford; Thomas the Lord Stanley (the King's Father in Law) Earl of Darby; and Edward Courtney Earl of Devon; tho' the King had then nevertheless a Purpose in himself to make more in time of Parliament, bearing a wife and decent respect to distribute his Creations, some to honour his Coronation, and some his Parliament.

The Coronation follow'd two Days after, K. Henry upon the 30th Day of October, in the Year of our Lord 1485; at which time Innocent the Eighth was Pope of Rome; Frederick the Third, Emperor of Almaine; and Maximilian his Son, newly chosen King of the Romans; Charles the Eighth King of France; Ferdinando and Isabella Kings of Spain; and James the Third, King of Scotland; with all which Kings and States, the King was at that time at good Peace and Amity. At which Day also (as if the Crown upon his Head had put Perils into his Thoughts) he did institute, for the better security of his Person, a Band of Fifty Archers under a Cap- tain to attend him, by the Name of Yeomen of his Guard: and yet that it might be thought to be rather a matter of Dignity, after the imitation of that he had known abroad, than any matter of Diffidence appropriate to his own Case, he made it to be understood for an Ordinance not temporary, but to hold in succession for ever after.

The Seventh of November the King held his Parliament at Westminster, which he had summon'd immediately after his coming to London. His Ends in calling a Parliament (and that so speedily) were chiefly Three; First, to procure the Crown to be intail'd upon himself: Next, To have the Attainders of all of his Party (which were in no small number) reversed, and all acts of Hostility by them done in his Quarrel, remitted and discharged; and on the other side to attaint by Parliament, the Heads and Principals of his Enemies. The Third, To calm and quiet the Fears of the rest of that Party by a General Pardon: Not being ignorant in how great danger a King stands from his Subjects, when most of his Subjects are conscious in themselves that they stand in his Danger. Unto these Three special Motives of a Parliament, was added, That he, as a prudent and moderate Prince, made this Judgment; That it was fit for him to hasten to let his People see that he meant to govern by Law, howsoever he came in by the Sword; and fit also to reclaim them to know him for their King, whom they had so lately talk'd of as an Enemy or Banish'd Man. For that which concern'd the Entailing of the Crown, (more than that he was true to his own Will, that he wou'd not endure any mention of the 1485. the Lady Elizabeth, no not in the nature of Special Entail) he carried it otherwise with great Wisdom and Measure: For he did not press to have the Act penn'd by way of Declaration or Recognition of Right; as on the other side he avoided to have it by New Law or Ordinance; but chose rather a kind of middle-way, by way of Establishment, and that under Covert and indifferent Words; That the Inheritance of the Crown should rest, remain, and abide in the King, &c. which Words might equally be apply'd; That the Crown should continue to him; but whether as having former Right to it, (which was doubtful) or having it then in Fact and Possession (which no Man denied) was left fair to interpretation either way. And again, for the Limitation of the Entail, he did not press it to go further than to himself and to the Heirs of his Body, not speaking of his Right Heirs; but leaving that to the Law to decide: So as the Entail might seem rather a personal Favour to him and his Children, than a total Dis-inheritance to the House of York. And in this Form was the Law drawn and pass'd; which Statute he procured to be confirm'd by the Pope's Bull the Year following, with mention, nevertheless, (by way of Recital) of his other Titles, both of Descent and Conquest: So as now the Wreath of Three was made a Wreath of Five; for to the three first Titles of the Two Houses, or Lines, and Conquest, were added Two more, the Authorities Parliamentary and Papal.

Persons attainted excepted against as Members of Parliament.

The King likewise in the Reversal of the Attainders of his Partakers, and discharging them of all Offences incident to his Service and Succour, had his Will, and Acts did pass accordingly: In the Passage whereof, Exception was taken to divers Persons in the House of Commons for that they were attainted, and thereby not legal, nor habilitate to serve in Parliament, being disabled in the highest degree; and that it should be a great Incongruity to have them to make Laws, who themselves were not inlaw'd. The truth was, that divers of those which had in the Time of King Richard been strongest and most declared for the King's Party, were return'd Knights and Burgesses for the Parliament; whether by Care or Recommendation from the State, or the voluntary Inclination of the People; many of which had been by Richard III. attainted by Outlawries, or otherwise. The King was somewhat troubled with this: For tho' it had a grave and specious Shew, yet it reflected upon his Party. But wisely not shewing himself at all moved therewith, he would not understand it but as a Case in Law, and wish'd the Judges to be advis'd thereupon; who, for that purpose, were forthwith assembled in the Exchequer-Chamber (which is the Council-Chamber of the Judges) and upon deliberation, they gave a grave and safe Opinion and Advice, mix'd with Law and Convenience; which was, That the Knights and Burgesses attainted by the Course of Law, should forbear to come into the House, till a Law were made for the Reversal of their Attainders.

Attainder of the Blood reaches not the Crown.

It was at that time incidently moved among the Judges in their Consultation, what should be done for the King himself, who likewise was attainted? But it was with unanimous consent resolv'd, That the Crown takes away all Defects and

Stops in Blood; and that from the time the King did assume the Crown, the Fountain was clear'd, and all Attainders and Corruption of Blood discharged. But nevertheless, for Honour's sake, it was ordain'd by Parliament, that all Records wherein there was any memory or mention of the King's Attainder, should be defaced, cancel'd, and taken off the File.

But on the Part of the King's Enemies, there were by Parliament attainted the late Duke of Gloucester, calling himself Richard the Third; the Duke of Norfolk, the Earl of Surrey, Viscount Lovel, the Lord Ferrers, the Lord Zouch, Richard Ratcliffe, William Catesby, and many others of Degree and (a) Quality. In which Bills of Attainders, nevertheless there were contain'd many just and temperate Clauses, Savings, and Proviso's, well shewing and fore-tokening the Wisdom, Stay, and Moderation of the King's Spirit of Government. And for the Pardon of the rest, that had stood against the King; the King, upon a second Advice, thought it not fit it should pass by Parliament, the better (being matter of Grace) to impropriate the Thanks to himself, using only the Opportunity of a Parliament time, the better to disperse it into the Veins of the Kingdom: Therefore during the Parliament, he publish'd his Royal Proclamation, offering Pardon and Grace of Restitution to all such as had taken Arms, or been Participant of any Attempts against him; so as they submitted themselves to his Mercy by a Day, and took the Oath of Allegiance and Fidelity to him: Whereupon many came out of Sanctuary, and many more came out of Fear, no less guilty than those that had taken Sanctuary.

As for Money or Treasure, the King thought it not seasonable, or fit to demand any of his Subjects at this Parliament; both because he had received satisfaction from them in Matters of so great Importance: And because he could not remunerate them with any General Pardon, being prevented therein by the Coronation Pardon, pass'd immediately before: but chiefly, for that it was in every Man's Eye, what great Forfeitures and Confiscations he had at that present to help himself; whereby those Casualties of the Crown, might in reason spare the Purfes of the Subject, especially in a time when he was in Peace with all his Neighbours. Some few Laws pass'd at that Parliament, almost for form sake: amongst which, there was One To reduce Aliens, being made Denizens, to pay Strangers Customs; and another, To draw to himself the Seifures and Compositions of Italians Goods, for not Employment, being Points of Profit to his Coffers, whereof from the very beginning he was not forgetful, and had been more happy at the latter end, if his early Providence (which kept him from all necessity of exacting upon his People) could likewise have attempt'd his Nature therein. He added, during Parliament, to his former Creations, the Innoblement or Advancement in Nobility of a few others: The Chandos of Brittain was made Earl of Bath; and Sir Giles Daubeny was made Lord Daubeny; and Sir Robert Willoughby Lord Brooke.

The King did also with great Nobleness and Bounty (which Virtues at that time had their turns in his Nature) restore Edward Stafford (eldest Son to Henry Duke of Buckingham; attainted

A Pardon put forth.

Forfeitures and Confiscations supply the King's Wants.

The Lord Stafford restored to the Honours and Estate of his Father the late Duke of Buckingham.

(a) Amongst whom was John Buck, a Relation of George Buck the Author of the Life of King Richard III. which perhaps was the reason why that Historian, in opposition to other Writers on the same Subject, endeavours to have it believed, That King Richard was both a Great and a Good Man. This John Buck was a Creature of the Duke of Norfolk, a fast Friend to K. Richard III. Buck lost his Head at Bosworth.

1485. in the Time of King Richard) not only to his Dignities, but to his Fortunes and Possessions, which were great; to which he was moved also by a kind of Gratitude, for that the Duke was the Man that mov'd the first Stone against the Tyranny of King Richard, and indeed made the King a Bridge to the Crown upon his own Ruins. Thus the Parliament brake up.

The Parliament being dissolv'd, the King sent forthwith Money to redeem the Marquess Dorset, and Sir John Bourchier, whom he had left as his Pledges at Paris, for Money which he had borrow'd when he made his Expedition for England. And thereupon he took a fit Occasion to send the Lord Treasurer and Mr. Bray (whom he used as Councillor) to the Lord Mayor of London, requiring of the City a Prest of Six thousand Marks: But after many Parleys, he could obtain but Two thousand Pounds. Which nevertheless the King took in good part; as Men use to do that practise to borrow Money when they have no need. About this time, the King called unto his Privy-Council John Morton and Richard Fox, the one Bishop of Ely, the other Bishop of Exeter, vigilant Men and secret, and such as kept watch with him almost upon all Men else. They had been both vers'd in his Affairs, before he came to the Crown, and were Partakers of his adverse Fortune. This Morton soon after upon the Death of Bourchier, he made Archbishop of Canterbury. And for Fox, he made him Lord Keeper of his Privy-Seal, and afterwards advanc'd him by degrees, from Exeter to Bath and Wells, thence to Durham, and last to Winchester. For altho' the King lov'd to employ and advance Bishops, because having rich Bishopricks, they carried their Reward upon themselves: Yet he did use to raise them by Steps, that he might not lose the Profit of the First-fruits, which by that course of Gradation was multiplied.

At last upon the 18th of January, was solemnized the so long expected and so much desir'd Marriage, between the King and the Lady Elizabeth: † Which Day of Marriage was celebrated with greater Triumph and Demonstrations (especially on the Peoples part) of Joy and Gladness, than the Days either of his Entry or Coronation; which the King rather noted than liked. And it is true, that all his Lifetime, while the Lady Elizabeth liv'd with him; (for she died before him) he shew'd himself no very indulgent Husband towards her, tho' she was Beautiful, Gentle, and Fruitful. But his Aversion towards the House of York was so predominant in him, as it found place, not only in his Wars and Counsels, but in his Chamber and Bed.

Towards the Middle of the Spring, the King full of Confidence and Assurance, as a Prince that had been Victorious in Battel, and had prevail'd with his Parliament in all that he desir'd, and had the Ring of Acclamations fresh in his Ears, thought the rest of his Reign should be but Play, and the enjoying of a Kingdom. Yet as a wife and watchful King, he would not neglect any thing for his Safety; thinking nevertheless to perform all things now, rather as an Exercise, than as a Labour. So he being truly inform'd that the Northern Parts were not only Affectionate to the House of York, but particularly had been devoted to King Richard the Third; thought it would be a Summer well spent to Visit those Parts, and by his Presence and Application of himself, to reclaim and rectify those Humours. But the King in his Account of Peace and Calms, did much Over-cast his Fortunes; which proved for many Years together full of Broken Seas, Tides and Tempests. For he was no sooner come to Lincoln, where he kept his Easter, but he receiv'd News, That the Lord Lovel, Humphrey Stafford, and Thomas Stafford (who had formerly taken Sanctuary at Colchester) were departed out of Sanctuary; but to what place, no Man could tell. Which Advertisement the King despised, and continued his Journey to York. At York there came fresh and more certain Advertisement, That the Lord Lovel was at hand with a great Power of Men, and that the Staffords were in Arms in Worcestershire, and had made their Approaches to the City of Worcester to Assault it. The King, as a Prince of great and profound Judgment, was not much moved with it; for that he thought it was but a Rag or Remnant of Bosworth-Field, and had Nothing in it of the main Party of the House of York. But he was more doubtful of the raising of Forces to resist the Rebels, than of the Resistance it self; for that he was in a Core of People whose Affections he suspected. But the Action enduring no Delay, he did speedily levy and send against the Lord Lovel to the Number of Three thousand Men, ill arm'd, but well assur'd (being taken some few out of his own Train, and the rest out of the Tenants and Followers of such as were safe to be trusted) under the Conduct of the Duke of Bedford. And as his manner was to send his Pardons rather before the Sword than after, he gave Commission to the Duke to proclaim Pardon to all that would come in: Which the Duke, upon his Approach to the Lord Lovel's Camp, did perform. And it fell out as the King expected; the Heralds were the great Ordinance. For the Lord Lovel upon Proclamation of Pardon, mistrusting his Men, fled into Lancashire, and lurking for a time with Sir Thomas Broughton, after Sail'd over into Flanders to the Lady Margaret: And his Men, forsaken of their Captain, did presently submit themselves to the Duke. The Staffords likewise, and their Forces, hearing what had happen'd to the Lord Lovel (in whose Success their chief Trust was) despair'd and dispers'd. The two Brothers taking Sanctuary at Colnham, a Village near Abingdon; which place upon View of their Privilege in the King's-Bench, being judged no sufficient Sanctuary for Traitors, Humphrey was executed at Tyburn; and Thomas, as being led by his Elder Brother, was pardon'd. So this Rebellion prov'd but a Blast, and the King having by this Journey purg'd a little the Dregs and Leaven of the Northern People, that were before in no good Affection towards him, return'd to London.

In September following, * the Queen was delivered of her first Son, whom the King (in Honour of the British Race, of which himself was) nam'd Arthur, according to the Name of that Ancient worthy King of the Britains; in whose Acts there is Truth enough to make him Famous, besides that which is Fabulous. The Child was Strong and Able, tho' he was Born in the Eighth Month, which the Physicians do prejudge.

* Holinshead writes, The Queen was deliver'd at Winchester, in Sept. 1488. which is more probable than that she should be deliver'd now; for she was married but on the 18th of January in this Year.

1486. There follow'd this Year, being the Second of the King's Reign, a strange Accident of State, whereof the Relations which we have are so naked, as they leave it scarce Credible; not for the Nature of it (for it hath faln out oft) but for the Manner and Circumstance of it, especially in the Beginnings. Therefore we shall make our Judgment upon the things themselves, as they give Light one to another, and (as we can) dig Truth out of the Mine. The King was green in his Estate; and, contrary to his own Opinion and Defert both, was not without much Hatred throughout the Realm. The Root of all, was the discountenancing of the House of York, which the general Body of the Realm still affected. This did alienate the Hearts of the Subjects from him daily more and more, especially when they saw, that after his Marriage, and after a Son born, the King did nevertheless not so much as proceed to the Coronation of the Queen, not vouchsafing her the Honour of a Matrimonial Crown; for the Coronation of her was not till almost two Years after, when Danger had taught him what to do. But much more when it was spread Abroad (whether by Errour, or the Cunning of Malecontents) that the King had a purpose to put to Death Edward Plantagenet closely in the Tower: whose Case was so nearly parallel'd with that of Edward the Fourth's Children, in respect of the Blood, like Age, and the very place of the Tower, as it did refresh and reflect upon the King a most Odious resemblance, as if he would be another King Richard. And all this time it was still whisper'd every where, that at least one of the Children of Edward IV. was living. Which Bruit was cunningly fomented by such as desir'd Innovation. Neither was the King's Nature and Customs greatly fit to disperse these Mists; but contrariwise he had a fashion rather to create Doubts than Assurance. Thus was Fuel prepar'd for the Spark; the Spark that afterwards kindled such a Fire and Combustion was at the first Contemptible.

Simon an Oxford Priest, lets up the Impostor Lambert Simnell. There was a subtil Priest call'd Richard Simon, that liv'd in Oxford, and had to his Pupil a Baker's Son nam'd Lambert Simnell, of the Age of some Fifteen Years; a comely Youth, and well favour'd, not without some Extraordinary Dignity and grace of Aspect. It came into this Priest's Fancy (hearing what Men talk'd, and in hope to raise himself to some great Bishoprick) to cause this Lad to Counterfeit and Personate the second Son of Edward IV. suppos'd to be Murder'd; and afterward (for he chang'd his Intention in the Manage) the Lord Edward Plantagenet, then Prisoner in the Tower, and accordingly to frame him and instruct him in the Part he was to play. This is that which (as was touch'd before) seemeth scarcely credible; Not that a False person should be assum'd to gain a Kingdom, for it hath been seen in ancient and late Times; nor that it should come into the Mind of such an abject Fellow, to enterprize so great a Matter; for high Conceits do sometimes come streaming into the Imaginations of base Persons, especially when they are Drunk with News and Talk of the People. But here is that which hath no Apparence; That this Priest being utterly unacquainted with the true Person, according to whose pattern he should shape his Counterfeit, should think it possible for him to instruct his Player, either in Gesture and Fashions, or in recounting past Matters of his Life and Education; or in fit Answers to Questions, or the like, any ways to come near the resemblance of him whom he was to represent. For this Lad was not to personate one that had been long before taken out of his Cradle, or convey'd away in his Infancy, known to few; but a Youth that till the Age almost of Ten Years had been brought up in a Court where infinite Eyes had been upon him. For King Edward touch'd with Remorse of his Brother the Duke of Clarence's Death, would not indeed restore his Son, (of whom we speak) to be Duke of Clarence; but yet created him Earl of Warwick, reviving his Honour on the Mother's Side, and used him honourably during his Time, tho' Richard III. afterwards confin'd him. So that it cannot be, but that some great Person that knew particularly and familiarly Edward Plantagenet, had a hand in the Business, from whom the Priest might take his Aim. That which is most probable, out of the precedent and subsequent Acts, is, that it was the Queen Dowager, from whom this Action had the principal Source and Motion: For certain it is, she was a busy negotiating Woman, and in her Withdrawing-Chamber had the fortunate Conspiracy for the King against K. Richard the Third been hatch'd; which the King knew, and remembered perhaps but too well; and was at this time extremely discontent with the King, thinking her Daughter (as the King handled the Matter) not advanced but depressed: And none could hold the Book so well to Prompt and Instruct this Stage-Play, as she could. Nevertheless it was not her meaning, nor no more was it the meaning of any of the better and sager Sort that favour'd this Enterprize and knew the Secret, that this disguised Idol should possess the Crown; but at his Peril to make way to the Overthrow of the King: and that done, they had their several Hopes and Ways. That which doth chiefly fortifie this Conjecture is, that as soon as the Matter brake forth in any Strength, it was one of the King's first Acts to cloister the Queen Dowager in the Nunnery of Bermondsey, and to take away all her Lands and Estate; and this by close Council without any legal Proceeding, upon far-fetch'd Pretences; That she had deliver'd her two Daughters out of Sanctuary to King Richard contrary to Promise. Which Proceeding being even at that time taxed for Rigorous and Undue, both in Matter and Manner, makes it very probable there was some greater Matter against her, which the King upon reason of Policy, and to avoid Envy would not Publish. It is likewise no small Argument that there was some Secret in it, and some suppressing of Examinations; for that the Priest Simon himself, after he was taken was never brought to Execution; no, not so much as to publick Trial (as many Clergymen were upon less Treasons) but was only shut up close in a Dungeon. Add to this, that after the Earl of Lincoln (a principal Person of the House of York) was Slain in Stoke-field, the King open'd himself to some of his Council, that he was sorry for the Earl's Death, because by him (he said) he might have known the bottom of his Danger.

But to return to the Narration it self; Simon did first instruct his Scholar for the part of Richard Duke of York, second Son to King Edward IV. and this was at such time as it was voiced that the King purposed to put to Death Edward Plantagenet Prisoner in the Tower, whereat there was great Murmur. But hearing soon after a general Bruit that Plantagenet had escap'd out of the Tower, and thereby finding him so much beloved amongst the People, and such Rejoycing at his Escape, the cunning Priest chang'd his Copy, and chose now Plantagenet to be the Subject 1486. Subject his Pupil should personate, because he was more in the present Speech and Votes of the People; and it pieced better, and follow'd more close and handsomly upon the Bruit of Plantagenet's Escape. But yet doubting that there would be too near looking and too much perspective into his Disguise, if he should shew it here in England; he thought good (after the manner of Scenes in Stage-Plays and Masks) to shew it afar off; and therefore sail'd with his Scholar into Ireland, where the Affection to the House of York was most in height. The King had been a little Improvident in the Matters of Ireland, and had not remov'd Officers and Counsellors, and put in their Places, or at least intermingled Persons, of whom he stood assured, as he should have done, since he knew the strong Bent of that Country towards the House of York; and that it was a ticklish and unsettled State, more easie to receive Distempers and Mutations than England was. But trusting to the Reputation of his Victories and Successes in England, he thought he should have time enough to extend his Cares afterwards to that second Kingdom.

Ireland favour'd the House of York.

The Irish receive Simon the Priest and his Pupil Simnel.

Wherefore through this Neglect, upon the coming of Simon with his pretended Plantagenet into Ireland, all things were prepar'd for Revolt and Sedition, almost as if they had been set and plotted beforehand. Simon's first Address was to the Lord (a) Thomas Fitz-gerard, Earl of Kildare, and Deputy of Ireland: before whose Eyes he did cast such a Mist (by his own Insinuation, and by the Carriage of his Youth, that express'd a natural Princely Behaviour) as joyn'd perhaps with some inward Vapours of Ambition and Affection in the Earl's own Mind, left him fully possess'd that it was the true Plantagenet. The Earl presently communicated the Matter with some of the Nobles (b) and others there, at the first Secretly. But finding them of like Affection to himself, he suffer'd it of purpose to Vent and pass Abroad; because they thought it not Safe to Resolve, till they had a taste of the Peoples Inclination. But if the Great ones were in Forwardness, the People were in Fury, entertaining this Airy Body or Phantasm with incredible Affection; partly, out of their great Devotion to the House of York; partly out of a Proud humour in the Nation, to give a King to the Realm of England. Neither did the Party in this Heat of Affection much trouble themselves with the Attainder of George Duke of Clarence; having newly learn'd by the King's Example, that Attainders do not interrupt the conveying of Title to the Crown. And as for the Daughters of K. Edward IV. they thought King Richard had said enough for them; and took them to be but as of the King's Party, because they were in his Power and at his Disposing. So that with marvellous Consent and Applause, this Counterfeit Plantagenet was brought with great Solemnity to the Castle of Dublin, and there saluted, serv'd and honour'd as King; the Boy becoming it well, and doing nothing that did bewray the Baseness of his Condition. And within a few days after he was proclaim'd King in Dublin, by the Name of K. Edward the Sixth; there being not a Sword drawn in King Henry's Quarrel.

The King was much moved with this unexpected Accident when it came to his Ears; both because it struck upon that String which ever he most fear'd, as also because it was stirred in such a Place, where he could not with Safety transferre his own Person to suppress it. For partly thro' Natural Valour, and partly thro' an Universal Suspicion (not knowing whom to trust) he was ever ready to wait upon all his Atchievements in Person. The King therefore first called his Council together at the Charter-house at Shine; which Council was held with great Secrecy: but the open Decrees thereof which presently came abroad were Three.

The First was, That the Queen Dowager, for that she, contrary to her Pact and Agreement with those that had concluded with her concerning the Marriage of her Daughter Elizabeth with King Henry, had nevertheless deliver'd her Daughters out of Sanctuary into King Richard's Hands; should be cloister'd in the Nunnery of Bermondsey, and forfeit all her Lands and Goods.

The Next was, That Edward Plantagenet then Close Prisoner in the Tower, should be in the most Publick and Notorious manner, that could be devised, shew'd unto the People: In part to discharge the King of the Envy of that Opinion and Bruit, how he had been put to Death privately in the Tower; But chiefly to make the People see the Levity and Imposure of the Proceedings of Ireland, and that their Plantagenet (c) was indeed but a Puppet, or a Counterfeit.

The Third was, That there should be again proclaim'd a general Pardon to all that would reveal their Offences, and submit themselves by a Day. And that this Pardon should be conceiv'd in so ample and liberal a manner, as no High-Treason (no not against the King's own Person) should be excepted. Which tho' it might seem strange, yet was it not so to a Wise King, that knew his greatest Dangers were not from the least Treasons, but from the greatest. These Resolutions of the King and his Council were immediately put in Execution. And first, the Queen Dowager was put into the Monastery of Bermondsey, and all her Estate seiz'd into the King's Hands, whereat there was much wondering; That a weak Woman, for the yielding to the Menaces and Promises of a Tyrant, after such a distance of time (wherein the King had shew'd no Displeasure nor Alteration) but much more after so happy a Marriage, between the King and her Daughter, blessed with Issue-Male, should upon so sudden mutability or disclosure of the King's Mind be so severely handled.

A general Pardon publish'd.

This Lady was amongst the Examples of great variety of Fortune. She had first from a distressed Suitor and desolate Widow, been taken to the Marriage-Bed of a Batchelor-King, the goodliest Personage of his Time; and even in his Reign she had endur'd a strange Eclipse by the King's Flight, and temporary depriving from the Crown. She was also very happy, in that she had by him fair Issue, and continu'd his Nuptial Love (helping her self by some obsequious bearing and dissembling of his Pleasures) to the very end. She was much Affectionate to her own Kindred, even unto Faction; which 1486. did stir great Envy in the Lords of the King's Side, who counted her Blood a Disparagement to be mingled with the King's. With which Lords of the King's Blood, joyn'd also the King's Favourite the Lord Hastings; who, notwithstanding the King's great Affection to him, was thought at times, through her Malice and Spleen, not to be out of Danger of Falling. After her Husband's Death, she was matter of Tragedy, having liv'd to see her Brother Beheaded, and her two Sons deposed from the Crown, Bastarded in their Blood, and cruelly Murthered. All this while nevertheless she enjoy'd her Liberty, State, and Fortunes. But afterwards again, upon the Rise of the Wheel, when she had a King to her Son-in-Law, and was made Grandmother to a Grandchild of the best Sex; yet was she (upon dark and unknown Reasons, and no less strange Pretences) precipitated and banish'd the World into a Nunnery; where it was almost thought dangerous to visit her, or see her; and where not long after she ended her Life: But was by the King's Commandment buried with the King her Husband at Windsor. She was Foundress of Queens-College in Cambridge. For this Act the King sustain'd great Obloquy, which nevertheless (besides the reason of State) was somewhat sweetned to him by a great Confiscation.

Queens-College in Cambridge Founded.

The E. of Warwick shewn to the People.

About this time also Edward Plantagenet was upon a Sunday brought throughout all the principal Streets of London, to be seen of the People. And having pass'd the View of the Streets, was conducted to Paul's Church in solemn Procession, where great store of people were assembled. And it was provided also in good fashion, that divers of the Nobility, and others of Quality (especially of those that the King most suspected, and knew the Person of Plantagenet best) had Communication with the young Gentleman by the way, and entertain'd him with Speech and Discourse; which did in effect mar the Pageant in Ireland with the Subjects here, at least with so many as out of Error, and not out of Malice, might be misled. Nevertheless, in Ireland (where it was too late to go back) it wrought little or no Effect. But contrariwise, they turn'd the Imposture upon the King, and gave out, That the King, to defeat the true Inheritor, and to mock the World and blind the Eyes of simple Men, had trick'd up a Boy in the likeness of Edward Plantagenet, and shewed him to the People, not sparing to prophane the Ceremony of a Procession, the more to countenance the Fable.

The General Pardon likewise near the same time came forth; and the King therewithal omitted no diligence, in giving straight order for the keeping of the Ports; that Fugitives, Malecontents, or suspected Persons might not pass over into Ireland and Flanders.

Mean while the Rebels in Ireland had sent privy Messengers both into England and into Flanders, who in both places had wrought Effects of no small Importance. For in England they won to their Party John Earl of Lincoln, Son of John de la Pole, Duke of Suffolk, and of Elizabeth, King Edward IV's eldest Sister. This Earl was a Man of great Wit and Courage, and had his Thoughts highly rais'd by Hopes and Expectations for a time. For Richard III. had a Resolution, out of his Hatred to both his Brethren, King Edward and the Duke of Clarence, and their Lines, (having had his Hand in both their Bloods) to disable their Issues upon false and incompetent Pretences; the one of Attainder, the other of Illegitimation; and to design this Gentleman (in case himself should die without Children) for Inheritor of the Crown. Neither was this unknown to the King, who had secretly an Eye upon him. But the King having tasted of the Envy of the People, for his Imprisonment of Edward Plantagenet, was doubtful to heap up any more Distastes of that Kind, by the Imprisonment of De la Pole also; the rather thinking it Policy to conserve him as a Corrivall unto the other. The Earl of Lincoln was induced to participate with the Action of Ireland, not lightly upon the strength of the Proceedings there, which was but a Bubble, but upon Letters from the Lady Margaret of Burgundy, in whose Succours and Declaration for the Enterprize, there seem'd to be a more solid Foundation, both for Reputation and Forces. Neither did the Earl refrain the Business, for that he knew the pretended Plantagenet to be but an Idol: But contrariwise, he was more glad it should be the false Plantagenet than the true: because the False being sure to fall away of himself, and the True to be made sure of by the King; it might open and pave a fair and prepar'd way to his own Title. With this Resolution he sail'd secretly into Flanders, where was a little before arriv'd the Lord Lovel, (d) leaving a Correspondence here in England with Sir Thomas Broughton, a Man of great Power and Dependencies in Lancashire. For before this time, when the pretended Plantagenet was first receiv'd in Ireland, secret Messengers had been also sent to the Lady Margaret, advertising her what was pass'd in Ireland, imploring Succours in an Enterprize (as they said) so Pious and Just, and that God had so miraculously prosper'd the beginning thereof; and making offer, that all things should be guided by her Will and Direction, as the Sovereign Patroness and Protectress of the Enterprize. Margaret was second Sister to King Edward IV. and had been second Wife to Charles, surnam'd the Hardy, Duke of Burgundy; by whom, having no Children of her own, she did with singular Care and Tendernefs intend the Education of Philip and Margaret, Grandchildren to her former Husband; which won her great Love and Authority among the Dutch. This Princess (having the Spirit of a Man, and Malice of a Woman) abounding in Treasure, by the greatness of her Dower, and her provident Government, and being Childless, and without any nearer Care, made it her Design and Enterprize to see the Majesty Royal of England once again re-placed in her House, and had set up King Henry as a Mark, at whose Overthrow all her Actions should aim and shoot; inasmuch as all the Counsels of his succeeding Troubles came chiefly out of that Quiver. And she bare such a mortal Hatred to the House of Lancaster, and personally to the King, as she was no ways mollify'd by the Conjunction of the Houses in her Niece's Marriage, but rather hated her Niece, as the means of the King's Ascent to the Crown, and Assurance therein. Wherefore with great Violence of Affection she embraced this Overture. And upon Counsel taken with the Earl of Lincoln and the Lord Lovel, and some other of the Party, it was resolv'd with all speed, the two Lords assisted with a Regiment of two thousand Almains, being Choice and Veteran Bands, under the Com-

Hoping, that when the Action should have the face of a received and settled Regality (with such a second Person, as the Earl of Lincoln, and the Conjunction and Reputation of Foreign Succours) the Fame of it would embolden and prepare all the Party of the Confederates and Malecontents within the Realm of England, to give them Assistance, when they should come over there. And for the Person of the Counterfeit, it was agreed, That if all things succeeded well, he should be put down, and the true Plantagenet received: Wherein nevertheless the Earl of Lincoln had his particular Hopes. After they were come into Ireland, and that the Party took Courage, by seeing themselves together in a Body, they grew very confident of Success, conceiving and discoursing amongst themselves, that they went in upon far better Cards to overthrow King Henry, than King Henry had to overthrow King Richard. And that if there were not a Sword drawn against them in Ireland, it was a sign the Swords in England would be soon sheath'd, or beaten down. And first, for a Bravery upon this Accession of Power, they crown'd their new King in the Cathedral Church of Dublin; (e) who formerly had been but proclaim'd only; and then sat in Council what should further be done. At which Council, tho' it were propounded by some, that it were the best way to establish themselves first in Ireland, and to make that the Seat of the War, and to draw King Henry thither in Person, by whose Absence they thought there would be great Alterations and Commotions in England; yet because the Kingdom there was poor, and they should not be able to keep their Army together, nor pay their German Soldiers, and for that also the Sway of the Irishmen, and generally of the Men-of-War, which (as in such cases of Popular Tumults is usual) did in Effect govern their Leaders, was eager, and in affection to make their Fortunes upon England: It was concluded with all possible speed to Transport their Forces into England. The King in the mean time, who at the first when he heard what was done in Ireland, tho' it troubled him, yet thought he should be well enough able to scatter the Irish as a Flight of Birds, and rattle away this Swarm of Bees, with their King; when he heard afterwards that the Earl of Lincoln was Embark'd in the Action, and that the Lady Margaret was declared for it, he apprehended the Danger in a true Degree as it was, and saw plainly that his Kingdom must again be put to the Stake, and that he must fight for it. And first, he did conceive, before he understood of the Earl of Lincoln's sailing into Ireland out of Flanders, that he should be assail'd both upon the East-parts of the Kingdom of England by some Impression from Flanders, and upon the North-west out of Ireland: And therefore having order'd Musters to be made in both Parts, and having provisionally design'd two Generals, Jasper Earl of Bedford, and John Earl of Oxford, (meaning himself also to go in Person where the Affairs should most require it) and nevertheless not expecting any actual Invasion at that time (the Winter being far on) he took his Journey himself towards Suffolk and Norfolk, for the confirming of those Parts. And being come to S. Edmonds-bury, he understood that Thomas Marquess of Dorset (who had been one of the Pledges in France) was hastening towards him, to purge himself of some Accusations which had been made against him. But the King, tho' he kept an Ear for him, yet was the time so doubtful, that he sent the Earl of Oxford to meet him, and forthwith to carry him to the Tower; with a fair Message nevertheless, that he should bear that Disgrace with Patience, for that the King meant not his hurt, but only to preserve him from doing hurt, either to the King's Service, or to himself; and that the King should always be able (when he had cleared himself) to make him Reparation.

From S. Edmonds-bury he went to Norwich, where he kept his Christmas. And from thence he went (in a manner of Pilgrimage) to Walsingham, where he visited our Ladies Church, famous for Miracles, and made his Prayers and Vows for Help and Deliverance. And from thence he return'd by Cambridge to London. Not long after, the Rebels, with their King (under the Leading of the Earl of Lincoln, the Earl of Kildare, the Lord Lovel, and Colonel Swart) landed at Fouldrey in Lancashire, whither there repair'd to them Sir Thomas Broughton with some small Company of English. The King by that time (knowing now the Storm would not divide, but fall in one place) had levied Forces in good number: And in Person (taking with him his two designed Generals, the Duke of Bedford and the Earl of Oxford) was come on his way towards them as far as Coventry, whence he sent forth a Troop of Light Horsemen for Discovery, and to intercept some Stragglers of the Enemies, by whom he might the better understand the particulars of their Progress and Purposes, which was accordingly done; though the King otherwise was not without Intelligence from Elspies in the Camp.

The Rebels took their way towards York, without spoiling the Country, or any Act of Hostility, the better to put themselves into favour of the People, and to personate their King: who (no doubt out of a Princely feeling) was Sparing and Compassionate towards his Subjects. But their Snow-ball did not gather as it went: For the People came not in to them; neither did any Rise or Declare themselves in other Parts of the Kingdom for them, which was caused partly by the good taste that the King had given his People of his Government, joyn'd with the Reputation of his Felicity; and partly for that it was an odious thing to the People of England, to have a King brought in to them upon the Shoulders of Irish and Dutch, of which their Army was in Substance compounded. Neither was it a thing done with any great Judgment on the Party of the Rebels, for them to take their way towards York: Considering that howsoever those parts had formerly been a Nursery of their Friends; yet it was there where the Lord Lovel had so lately Disbanded, and where the King's presence had a little before qualify'd Discontents. The Earl of Lincoln deceiv'd of his Hopes of the Countries Concourse unto him (in which case he would

But the King was somewhat before this time come to Nottingham, where he call'd a Council of War, at which was consulted, whether it were best to protract time, or speedily to set upon the Rebels. In which Council the King himself (whose continual Vigilancy did suck in sometimes causeless Suspicions which few else knew) inclined to the accelerating a Battel. But this was presently put out of doubt by the great Aids that came in to him in the instant of this Consultation; partly upon Missives, and partly Voluntaries from many Parts of the Kingdom.

The Principal Persons that came then to the King's Aid, were the Earl of Shrewsbury and the Lord Strange, of the Nobility; and of Knights and Gentlemen to the Number of at least Three-score and ten Persons, with their Companies, making in the whole at the least Six thousand fighting Men, besides the Forces that were with the King before. Whereupon the King, finding his Army so bravely re-enforced, and a great Alacrity in all his Men to fight, was confirm'd in his former Resolution, and march'd speedily, so as he put himself between the Enemies Camp and Newark; being loth their Army should get the Commodity of that Town. The Earl nothing dismay'd, came forwards that Day unto a little Village call'd Stoke, and there encamp'd that Night upon the Brow or hanging of a Hill. The King the next Day (f) presented him Battel upon the Plain, the Fields there being open and Champion. The Earl courageously came down and joyned Battel with him. Concerning which Battel, the Relations that are left unto us are so naked and negligent (tho' it be an Action of so recent Memory) as they rather declare the Success of the Day, than the Manner of the Fight. They say, that the King divided his Army into three Battels; whereof the Van-guard only well strengthen'd with Wings came to fight. That the Fight was fierce and obstinate, and lasted three Hours, before the Victory inclined either way; save that Judgment might be made, by that the King's Van-guard of it self maintain'd Fight against the whole Power of the Enemies, the other two Battels remaining out of Action) what the Success was like to be in the end. That Martin Swart with his *German*s perform'd bravely; and so did those few English that were on that Side; neither did the Irish fail in Courage or Fierceness, but being almost naked Men, only arm'd with Darts and Skeins, it was rather an Execution, than a Fight upon them; insomuch as the furious Slaughter of them was a great discouragement and appalement to the rest; That there died upon the place all the Chieftains; That is, the Earl of Lincoln, the Earl of Kildare, (g) Francis Lord Lovel, Martin Swart, and Sir Thomas Broughton; all making good the Fight without any Ground given. Only of the Lord Lovel there went a Report, that he fled and swam over Trent on Horseback, but could not recover the further Side, by reason of the steepness of the Bank, and so was Drown'd in the River. But another Report leaves him not there, but that he liv'd long after in a Cave or Vault. The Number that was Slain in the Field, was of the Enemies part Four thousand at the least; and of the King's part, one half of his Van-guard, besides many hurt, but none of Name. There were taken Prisoners amongst others, the Countess Plantagenet (now, Lambert Simnell again) and the crafty Priest his Tutor. For Lambert the King would not take his Life, both out of Magnanimity, taking him but as an Image of Wax that others had temper'd and moulded; and likewise out of Wisdom, thinking that if he suffer'd Death, he would be forgotten too soon; but being kept Alive, he would be a continual Spectacle, and a Kind of Remedy against the like Inchantments of People in time to come. For which cause he was taken into Service in his Court to a base Office in his Kitchen; so that (in a kind of Mattacina of Human Fortune) he turn'd a Broach that had worn a Crown. Whereas Fortune commonly doth not bring in a Comedy or Farce after a Tragedy. And afterwards he was preferred to be one of the King's Falconers. As to the Priest, he was committed close Prisoner, and heard of no more; the King loving to Seal up his own Dangers (h).

After the Battel the King went to Lincoln, where he caused Supplications and Thanksgivings to be made for his Deliverance and Victory. And that his Devotions might go round in Circle, he sent his Banner to be offer'd to our Lady of Walsingham, where before he made his Vows. And thus deliver'd of this so strange an Engine and new Invention of Fortune, he return'd to his former Confidence of Mind; thinking now, that all his Misfortunes had come at once: But it fell out unto him according to the Speech of the Common People in the beginning of his Reign, that said, It was a Token he should reign in labour, because his Reign began with a Sickness of Sweat. But howsoever the King thought himself now in a Haven, yet such was his Wisdom, as his Confidence did seldom darken his Foresight, especially in Things near hand. And therefore awaken'd by so fresh and unexpected Dangers, he entred into due Consideration, as well how to weed out the Partakers of the former Rebellion, as to kill the Seeds of the like in time to come; and withal to take away all Shelters and Harbours for discontented Persons, where they might hatch and foster Rebellions, which afterwards might gather Strength and Motion. And First, He did yet again make a Progress from Lincoln to the Northern Parts, tho' indeed it were rather an Itinerary Circuit of Justice, than a Progress: For all along as he went, with much Severity and strict Inquisition, partly by Martial Law, and partly by Commission, were punished, the Adherents and Aiders of the late Rebels: Not all by Death, (for the Field had drawn much Blood) but by Fines and Ransoms which spared Life and raised Treasure. Amongst other Crimes of this na-

(f) Polydore Virgil places this Battel in the Year 1485. But that is not one of the least Mistakes in his History.

(g) 'Twas the Lord Thomas Fitzgerald, whom, says Sir James Ware, Some do erroneously call the Earl of Kildare. There fell also Maurice Fitz-Thomas a Geraldine, and Plunket the Baron of Kelleny's Son.

(h) The King wrote to the Mayor and Citizens of Waterford in Ireland, to Commend their Fidelity, which he next Year rewarded with new Privileges and Immunities. The Earl of Kildare and the Lords who had sided with Lambert, sent over Letters to the King and beg'd Pardon; which he not only granted them, but continu'd the Earl of Kildare Lord Deputy. Sir J. Ware, Cap. 111.

In the Year following, Sir Richard Edgcumb was sent over to Ireland with 300 Men to take new Oaths of Allegiance of the Nobility, and King Henry order'd them to come to England; where he Feasted them all, and gave the Lord Heath 300*l.* in Gold.

1487. ture, there was diligent Enquiry made of such as had raised and dispersed a Bruit and Rumour, a little before the Field fought, That the Rebels had the Day, and that the King's Army was overthrown, and the King fled: Whereby it was supposed, that many Succours, which otherwise would have come unto the King, were cunningly put off and kept back. Which Charge and Accusation, though it had some ground, yet it was industriously embraced and put on by divers, who having been in themselves not the best affected to the King's Part, nor forward to come to his Aid, were glad to apprehend this Colour to cover their Neglect and Coldness, under the pretence of such Discouragements. Which cunning nevertheless the King would not understand, tho' he lodg'd it, and noted it in some particulars, as his manner was.

But for the extirpating of the Roots and Causes of the like Commotions in time to come, the King began to find where his Shoe did wring him, and that it was his depressing of the House of York, that did rangle and fester the Affections of his People. And therefore being now too wise to disdain Perils any longer, and willing to give some Contentment in that Kind (at least in Ceremony) he resolv'd at last to proceed to the Coronation of his Queen. And therefore at his coming to London, where he entred in State, and in a kind of Triumph, and celebrated his Victory with two Days of Devotion, (for the first Day he repair'd to Paul's, and had the Hymn of Te Deum Sung, and the Morrow after he went in Procession, and heard the Sermon at the Cross) the Queen was with great Solemnity crown'd at Westminster, the Five and twentieth of November, in the Third Year of his Reign, which was about two Years after the Marriage; Like an old Christning, that had stayed long for Godfathers. Which strange and unusual distance of Time, made it Subject to every Man's note, that it was an Act against his Stomach, and put upon him by Necessity and Reason of State. Soon after, to shew that it was now fair Weather again, and that the Imprisonment of Thomas Marquess Dorset, was rather upon Suspicion of the Time than of the Man, he the said Marquess was set at Liberty without Examination, or other Circumstance. At that time also the King sent an Ambassador unto Pope Innocent, signifying unto him this his Marriage, and that now (like another Aeneas) he had passed through the Floods of his former Troubles and Travels, and was arriv'd unto a Safe Haven: and thanking his Holiness that he had honour'd the Celebration of his Marriage with the presence of his Ambassador; and offering both his Person and the Forces of his Kingdom upon all Occasions to do him Service.

The Ambassador making his Oration to the Pope, in the presence of the Cardinals, did so magnifie the King and Queen, as was enough to glut the Hearers. But then he did again so extol and deify the Pope, as made all that he had said in Praise of his Master and Mistress seem temperate and passable. But he was very honourably entertain'd, and extreemly much made on by the Pope: Who knowing himself to be Lazy and Unprofitable to the Christian World, was wonderfully Glad to hear that there were such Echoes of him sounding in remote Parts. He obtain'd also of the Pope a very Just and Honourable Bull, qualifying the Privileges of Sanctuary (where-with the King had been extreemly gauled) in three Points.

1487. The first, That if any Sanctuary-man did by Night, or otherwise, get out of Sanctuary privately and commit Mischief and Trespass, and then come in again, he should lose the Benefit of Sanctuary for ever after. The Second, That howsoever the Person of the Sanctuary-man was protected from his Creditors, yet his Goods out of Sanctuary should not. The Third, That if any took Sanctuary for Cause of Treason, the King might appoint him Keepers to look to him in Sanctuary.

The King also for the better Securing of his Estate, against mutinous and malecontented Subjects (whereof he saw the Realm was full) who might have their Refuge into Scotland, which was not under Key, as the Ports were; For that Cause, rather than for any doubt of Hostility from those Parts, before his coming to London (when he was at New-Castle) had * sent a Solemn Embassage unto James III. King of Scotland, to Treat and Conclude a Peace with him. The Ambassadors were Richard Fox Bishop of Exeter, and Sir Richard Edgcomb, Comptroller of the King's House, who were honourably receiv'd and entertain'd there. But the King of Scotland labouring of the same Disease that King Henry did (tho' more Mortal, as afterwards appear'd) that is, Discontented Subjects, apt to rise and raise Tumult, altho' in his own Affection he did much desire to make a Peace with the King; yet finding his Nobles averse, and not daring to displease them, concluded only a Truce for Seven Years; giving nevertheless Promise in Private, that it should be renew'd from time to time, during the two Kings lives.

Hitherto the King had been exercis'd in settling his Affairs at Home. But about this time brake forth an Occasion that drew him to look abroad, and to hearken to foreign Business. Charles VIII. the French King, by the Vertue and good Fortune of his two immediate Predecessors, Charles VII. his Grandfather, and Lewis XI. his Father, receiv'd the Kingdom of France in more flourishing and spreading Estate than it had been of many Years before; being reintegrate in those Principal Members which anciently had been Portions of the Crown of France, and were after dismembered, so as they remain'd only in Homage, and not in Sovereignty (being govern'd by absolute Princes of their own) Anjou, Normandy, Provence and Burgundy. There remain'd only Brittain to be reunited, and so the Monarchy of France to be reduced to the ancient Terms and Bounds.

King Charles was not a little inflamed with an Ambition to re-purchase and re-annex that Dutchy. Which his Ambition was a Wife and well-weigh'd Ambition; not like unto the Ambitions of his succeeding Enterprizes of Italy. For at that time being newly come to the Crown, he was somewhat guided by his Father's Counsels (Counsels, not Counsellors) for his Father was his own Counsel, and had few Able Men about him. And that King (he knew well) had ever distast'd the Designs of Italy, and in particular had an Eye upon Brittain. There were many Circumstances that did feed the Ambition of Charles, with pregnant and apparent Hopes of Success. The Duke of Brittain Old, and entred into a Lethargy, and serv'd with Mercenary Counsellors, Father of two only Daughters, the one Sickly and not like to continue. King Charles himself in the Flower of his Age, and the Subjects of France at that time well train'd for War, both for Leaders and Soldiers; Men of Service being not yet worn out since the Wars of Lewis against Burgundy. He found

1488. found himself also in Peace with all his Neighbour Princes. As for those that might oppose to his Enterprize, Maximilian King of Romans, his Rival in the same Desires, (as well for the Dutchy, as the Daughter) feeble in Means; and King Henry of England as well somewhat obnoxious to him for his Favours and Benefits, as busy'd in his particular Troubles at Home. There was also a fair and specious Occasion offer'd him to hide his Ambition and to justify his Warring upon Britain, for that the Duke had receiv'd and succour'd Lewis Duke of Orleanse, and other of the French Nobility, which had taken Arms against their King. Wherefore King Charles being resolv'd upon that War, knew well he could not receive any Opposition so Potent, as if King Henry should either upon Policy of State, in preventing the growing Greatness of France; or upon Gratitude unto the Duke of Britain, for his former Favours in the time of his Distress, espouse that Quarrel, and declare himself in Aid of the Duke. Therefore he no sooner heard that King Henry was settled by his Victory, but forthwith he sent Ambassadors unto him to pray his Assistance, or at the least that he would stand Neutral. Which Ambassadors found the King at Leicester, and deliver'd their Embassage to this Effect. They first imparted unto the King the Success that their Master had had a little before against Maximilian, in recovery of certain Towns from him; which was done in a kind of Privacy, and inwardness towards the King: as if the French King did not esteem him for an outward or formal Confederate, but as one that had part in his Affections and Fortunes, and with whom he took Pleasure to communicate his Business. After this Complement, and some Gratulation for the King's Victory, they fell to their Errand; declaring to the King, That their Master was enforced to enter into a Just and Necessary War with the Duke of Britain, for that he had receiv'd and succour'd those that were Traitors, and declared Enemies unto his Person and State. That they were no mean, distressed and calamitous Persons that fled to him for Refuge, but of so great Quality, as it was apparent that they came not thither to protect their own Fortune, but to infect and invade his; the Head of them being the Duke of Orleanse, the first Prince of the Blood, and the second Person of France. That therefore, rightly to understand it, it was rather on their Master's part a Defensive War than an Offensive; as that, that could not be omitted or forborn, if he tendered the Conservation of his own Estate; and that it was not the first Blow that made the War invasive, (for that no wise Prince would stay for) but the first Provocation, or at least the first Preparation. Nay, that this War was rather a Suppression of Rebels, than a War with a just Enemy, where the case is; That his Subjects, Traitors, are receiv'd by the Duke of Britain his Homager. That K. Henry knew well what went upon it in Example, if Neighbour-Princes should Patronize and Comfort Rebels, against the Law of Nations and of Leagues. Nevertheless that their Master was not ignorant, that King had been beholding to the Duke of Britain in his Adversity; as on the other side, they knew he would not forget also the Readiness of their King, in Aiding him when the Duke of Britain, or his mercenary Councillors fail'd him and would have betray'd him; And that there was a great difference between the Courtesies receiv'd from their Master and the Duke of Britain; for that the Duke's might have Ends of Utility and Bargain; whereas their Masters could not have proceeded but out of entire Affection. For that, if it had been measur'd by a Politick Line, it had been better for his Affairs, that a Tyrant should have reign'd in England, troubled and hated, than such a Prince, whose Vertues could not fail to make him great and Potent, whensoever he was come to be Master of his Affairs. But howsoever it stood for the point of Obligation which the King might owe to the Duke of Britain, yet their Master was well assur'd, it would not divert King Henry of England from doing that that was just, nor ever embark him in so ill-grounded a Quarrel. Therefore, since this War which their Master was now to make, was but to deliver himself from imminent Dangers, their King hop'd the King would shew the like Affection to the Conservation of their Master's Estate, as their Master had (when time was) shew'd to the King's Acquisition of his Kingdom. At the least, that according to the Inclination which the King had ever profess'd of Peace, he would look on, and stand Neutral; for that their Master could not with reason press him to undertake part in the War, being so newly settled and recover'd from Intestine Seditions.

But touching the Myserie of re-annexing of the Dutchy of Britain to the Crown of France, either by War, or by Marriage with the Daughter of Britain; the Ambassadors bare aloofe from it, as from a Rock, knowing that it made most against them. And therefore by all means declined any mention thereof, but contrariwise interlaced in their Conference with the King, the assured Purpose of their Master, to match with the Daughter of Maximilian: And entertain'd the King also with some wandring Discourses of their King's purpose to recover by Arms his Right to the Kingdom of Naples, by an Expedition in Person; All to remove the King from all Jealousie of any Design in these hither Parts upon Britain, otherwise than for quenching of the Fire, which he fear'd might be kindled in his own Estate.

The King after Advice taken with his Council, made Answer to the Ambassadors. And first returned their Complement, shewing he was right glad of the French King's reception of those Towns from Maximilian. Then he familiarly related some particular Passages of his own Adventures and Victory passed. As to the Business of Britain, the King answer'd in few Words; That the French King and the Duke of Britain were the two Persons to whom he was most obliged of all Men; and that he should think himself very Unhappy if things should go so between them, as he should not be able to acquit himself in Gratitude towards them both; and that there was no means for him as a Christian King and a Common Friend to them, to satisfy all Obligations both to God and Man, but to offer himself for a Mediator of an Accord and Peace between them; by which course he doubted not but their King's Estate and Honour both, would be preserv'd with more Safety and less Envy than by a War, and that he would spare no Cost or Pains, no if it were to go on Pilgrimage for so good an Effect: And concluded, that in this great Affair, which he took so much to Heart, he would express himself more fully by an Embassage, which he would speedily dispatch unto the French King for that purpose. And in this sort the French Ambassadors were dismissed; The King avoiding to understand any thing touching the re-annexing of Britain, as the Ambassa-

1488. Ambassadors had avoided to mention it; save that he gave a little touch of it in the Word, Envy. And so it was, that the King was neither so shallow, nor so ill advertis'd. as not to perceive the Intention of the French King, for the Investing himself of Britain. But first he was utterly unwilling (howsoever he gave out) to enter into War with France. A Fame of a War he liked well, but not an Atchievement; for the one he thought would make him Richer, and the other Poorer: and he was possessed with many secret Fears touching his own People, which he was therefore loth to arm, and put Weapons into their Hands. Yet notwithstanding (as a Prudent and Courageous Prince) he was not so averse from a War, but that he was resolved to choose it, rather than to have Britain carried by France, being so great and opulent a Dutchy, and situate so opportunely to annoy England, either for Coast, or Trade. But the King's hopes were, that partly by Negligence, commonly imputed to the French (especially in the Court of a young King) and partly by the Native Power of Britain it self, which was not small; but chiefly in respect of the great Party that the Duke of Orleanse had in the Kingdom of France, and thereby Means to stir up Civil Troubles, to divert the French King from the Enterprize of Britain. And lastly, in regard of the Power of Maximilian, who was Corrivall to the French King in that Pursuit, the Enterprize would either bow to a Peace, or break in it self. In all which, the King measur'd and valued things amiss, as afterwards appear'd. He sent therefore forthwith to the French King, Christopher Urswicke his Chaplain, a person by him much trusted and imploy'd: choosing him the rather, because he was a Churchman, as best sorting with an Embassy of Pacification; and giving him also a Commission, That if the French King consented to Treat, he should thence repair to the Duke of Britain, and ripen the Treaty on both Parts. Urswicke made Declaration to the French King, much to the purpose of the King's Answer to the French Ambassadors here; instilling also tenderly some Overture of receiving to Grace the Duke of Orleanse, and some taste of Conditions of Accord. But the French King on the other side proceeded not Sincerely, but with a great deal of Art and Dissimulation, in this Treaty; having for his End to gain time, and so put off the English Succours, under hope of Peace, till he had got good footing in Britain, by force of Arms. Wherefore he answer'd the Ambassador, That he would put himself into the King's Hands, and make him Arbitrer of the Peace; and willingly consented, that the Ambassador should straightways pass into Britain, to signifie this his consent, and to know the Duke's Mind likewise; well foreseeing, that the Duke of Orleanse, by whom the Duke of Britain was wholly led, taking himself to be upon terms irreconcilable with him, would admit of no Treaty of Peace. Whereby he should in one, both generally abroad veil over his Ambition, and win the Reputation of Just and Moderate Proceedings; and should withal endear himself in the Affections of the King of England, as one that had committed all to his Will: Nay, and (which was yet more fine) make Faith in him, That altho' he went on with the War, yet it should be but with his Sword in his hand, to bend the stiffness of the other Party to accept of Peace: and so the King should take no Umbrage of his arming and prosecution; but the Treaty to be kept on foot, to the very last instant, till he were Master of the Field.

The Fr.
King's Dissimulation.

Which Grounds being by the French King wisely laid, all things fell out as he expected. For when the English Ambassador came to the Court of Britain, the Duke was then scarcely perfect in his Memory, and all things were directed by the Duke of Orleanse; who gave Audience to the Chaplain Urswicke, and upon his Ambassage deliver'd, made Answer in somewhat high Terms: That the Duke of Britain having been an Host, and a kind of Parent or Foster-father to the King, in his tenderness of Age and weakness of Fortune, did look for at this time from King Henry (the renowned King of England) rather brave Troops for his Succours, than a vain Treaty of Peace. And if the King could forget the good Offices of the Duke done unto him aforetime; yet he knew well, he would in his Wisdom consider of the Future, how much it imported his own Safety and Reputation, both in foreign Parts and with his own People, not to suffer Britain (the old Confederates of England) to be swallow'd up by France, and so many good Ports and Strong Towns upon the Coast be in the Command of so Potent a Neighbour-King, and so Ancient an Enemy. And therefore humbly desired the King to think of this Business as his own; and therewith brake off, and denied any further conference for Treaty.

Urswicke return'd first to the French King, and related to him what had passed. Who finding things to sort to his Desire, took hold of them, and said, That the Ambassador might perceive now that which he for his part partly imagined before. That considering in what Hands the Duke of Britain was, there would be no Peace, but by a mixt Treaty of Force and Perswasion. And therefore he would go on with the one, and desired the King not to desist from the other. But for his own part, he did faithfully promise to be still in the King's Power to rule him in the matter of Peace. This was accordingly represented unto the King by Urswicke at his Return, and in such a fashion as if the Treaty were in no sort desperate, but rather stay'd for a better Hour, till the Hammer had wrought, and beat the Party of Britain more pliant. Whereupon there passed continually Packets and Dispatches between the two Kings, from the one out of Desire, and from the other out of Dissimulation, about the Negotiation of Peace. The French King mean while invaded Britain with great Forces, and distress'd the City of Nants with a strait Siege, and (as one, who tho' he had no great Judgment, yet had that, that he could dissemble home) the more he did urge the Prosecution of the War, the more he did at the same time urge the Solicitation of the Peace. Infomuch as during the Siege of Nants, after many Letters and particular Messages, the better to maintain his Dissimulation, and to refresh the Treaty; he sent Bernard Daubigny (a Person of good Quality) to the King, earnestly to desire him to make an end of the Business howsoever.

The King was no less ready to revive and quicken the Treaty: And thereupon sent three Commissioners, the Abbot of Abington, † Sir Richard Tunstall and Chaplain Urswicke formerly imploy'd, to do their utmost Endeavors, to manage the Treaty roundly and strongly.

About this time the Lord Woodville, (Uncle to the Queen) a Valiant Gentleman and desirous of Honour, sued to the King, that he might raise some Power of Voluntaries under-hand, and without Licence or Passport (wherein the King might any ways appear) go to the Aid of the Duke

Duke

1488. Duke of Brittain. The King denied his Request (or at least seemed so to do) and lay'd strait Commandment upon him, that he should not stir, for that the King thought his Honour would suffer therein during a Treaty, to better a Party. Nevertheless this Lord (either being unruly, or out of conceit that the King would not inwardly dislike that, which he would not openly avow) sail'd secretly over into the Isle of Wight, whereof he was Governour, and levied a fair Troop of four Hundred Men, and with them passed over into Brittain, and joynd himself with the Duke's Forces. The News whereof when it came to the French Court, put divers Young Bloods into such a Furie, as the English Ambassadors were not without Peril to be outraged. But the French King both to preserve the Priviledge of Ambassadors, and being conscious to himself that in the Business of Peace, he himself was the greater Dissembler of the two, forbade all Injuries of Fact or Word, against their Persons, or Followers. And presently came an Agent from the King, to purge himself touching the Lord Woodville's going over, using for a principal Argument, to demonstrate that it was without his Privy, for that the Tropes were so small, as neither had the Face of a Succour by Authority; nor could much advance the Brittain Affairs. To which Message, although the French King gave no full Credit, yet he made fair Weather with the King, and seemed satisfied: Some after the English Ambassadors returned, having two of them been likewise with the Duke of Brittain, and found things in no other Terms, than they were before. Upon their return, they inform'd the King of the State of the Affairs, and how far the French King was from any true meaning of Peace; and therefore he was now to advise of some other Course. Neither was the King himself lead all this while with Credulity merely, as was generally supposed: But his Error was not so much Facility of Belief, as an ill Measuring of the Forces of the other Partie.

For (as was partly touch'd before) the King had cast the Business thus with himself. He took it for granted in his own Judgment, that the War of Brittain, in respect of the Strength of the Towns, and of the Party; could not speedily come to a Period. For he conceiv'd that the Counsels of a War, that was undertaken by the French King, then Childless, against an Heir-apparent of France, would be very Faint and Slow. And besides, that it was not possible, but that the State of France should be imbroil'd with some Troubles and Alterations in Favour of the Duke of Orleanse. He conceived likewise, that Maximilian, King of the Romans, was a Prince Warlike and Potent; who (he made account) would give Succours to the Brittains roundly. So then judging it would be a Worke of Time, he laid his Plot, how he might best make use of that Time, for his own Affairs. Wherein first he thought to make his Vantage upon his Parliament; knowing that they being Affectionate unto the Quarrel of Brittain, would give Treasure largely. Which Treasure, as a Noise of War might draw forth; so a Peace succeeding might Coffer up. And because he knew his People were hot upon the Business, he chose rather to seem to be deceiv'd, and lull'd asleepe by the French, than to be backward in himself; considering his Subjects were not so fully capable of the Reasons of State, which made him hold back. Wherefore to all these purposes he saw no other expedient, than to set and keep on Foot a continual Treatie of Peace;

laying it down, and taking it up again, as the Occurrence requir'd. Besides, he had in consideration the point of Honour in bearing the blessed Person of a Pacificator. Hee thought likewise to make use of the Envie, that the French King met with, by occasion of this War of Brittain, in strengthening himself with new Alliances; as namely that of Ferdinando of Spain, with whom he had ever a consent even in Nature and Customs; and likewise with Maximilian, who was particularly interess'd. So that in Substance he promised himself Money, Honour, Friends, and Peace in the End. But those things were too fine to be fortunate, and succeed in all parts; for that great Affairs are commonly too rough and stubborn to be wrought upon by the finer Edges, or Points of Wit. The King was likewise deceived in his two main Grounds. For although he had Reason to conceive, that the Council of France would be wary to put the King into a War against the Heir-apparent of France; yet he did not consider, that Charles was not guided by any of the Principal of the Blood or Nobility, but by mean Men, who would make it their Master-piece of Credit and Favour, to give Venturous Counsels, which no great or Wise Man durst, or would. And for Maximilian, he was thought then a Greater-matter than he was; his unstable and Necessitous Courses being not then known.

After Consultation with the Ambassadors, who brought him no other News, than he expected before (though he would not seeme to know it till then) he presently summoned his Parliament, and in open Parliament propounded the Cause of Brittain to both Houses, by his Chancellor Morton Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, who spake to this Effect.

"MY Lords and Masters; The King's Grace our Sovereign Lord, hath commanded me to declare unto you the Causes that have moved him at this time to Summon this his Parliament; which I shall do in few Words, craving Pardon of his Grace, and you all, if I perform it not as I would.

"His Grace doth first of all let you know, that he retaineth in thankful Memorie the Love and Loyalty shewed to him by you, at your last meeting, in Establishment of his Royaltie; freeing and discharging of his Partakers, and Confiscation of his Traytors and Rebels: more than which could not come from Subjects to their Sovereign, in one Action. This he taketh so well at your Hands, as he hath made it a Resolution to himself, to communicate with so loving and well approved Subjects, in all Affairs that are of publick Nature, at home or abroad.

"Two therefore are the Causes of your present Assembling: the one, a foreign Business; the other, matter of Government at Home.

"The French King (as no doubt ye have heard) maketh at this present hot War upon the Duke of Brittain. His Army is now before Nantes, and holdeth it straightly besieg'd being the Principal City (if not in Ceremonie and Preheminence, yet in Strength and Wealth) of that Dutchie. Ye may guess at his Hopes, by his attempting of the Hardest part of the War first. The Cause of this War he knoweth best. He alledgeth the entertaining and succouring of the Duke of Orleanse, and some other French Lords, whom the King taketh for his Enemies. Others divine of other Matters. Both parts have by their Ambassadors divers times prayed the

King's Aids: The French King Aids, or Newtrality; the Britons Aids simply; for so their Case requireth. The King, as a Christian Prince, and Blessed Son of the Holy Church hath offered himself as a Mediator, to treat a Peace between them. The French King yeildeth to treat, but will not stay the Prosecution of the War. The Britons, that desire Peace most, hearken to it least; not upon Confidence or Stiffness, but upon Distrust of true Meaning, seeing the War goes on. So as the King, after as much Pains and Care to effect a Peace, as ever he took in any Business, not being able to remove the Prosecution on the one Side, nor the Distrust on the other, caused by that Prosecution, hath let fall the Treatie; not repenting of it, but despising of it now, as not likely to succeed.
Therefore by this Narrative you now understand the State of the Question, whereupon the King prayeth your Advice: which is no other, but whether he shall enter into an Auxiliary and Defensive War for the Britons against France.

And the better to open your understandings in this Affair, the King hath commanded me to say somewhat to you from him, of the Persons that do intervene in this Business;
and somewhat of the Consequence thereof, as it hath relation to this Kingdom; and somewhat of the Example of it in general:
Making nevertheless no Conclusion or Judgment of any Point, untill his Grace hath received your faithful and politick Advices.

First, for the King our Sovereign himself, who is the principal Person you are to eye in this Business; his Grace doth Profess, that he truly and constantly desireth to reign in Peace. But his Grace saith, he will neither buy Peace with Dishonour, nor take it up at Interest of Danger to ensue; but shall think it a good Change, if it please God to change the inward Troubles and Seditions, wherewith he hath been hitherto exercised, into an honourable Foreign War. And for the other two Persons in this Action, the French King, and the Duke of Brittain, his Grace doth declare unto you, that they be the Men, unto whom he is of all other Friends and Allies most bounden: the one having held over him his Hand of Protection from the Tyrant;
the Other having reacht forth unto him his Hand of Help, for the Recovery of his Kingdom. So that his Affection toward them in his natural Person, is upon equal Terms. And whereas you may have heard, that his Grace was enforced to flie out of Brittain into France, for doubts of being betrayed; his Grace would not in any sort have that reflect upon the Duke of Brittain, in Defacement of his former Benefits: For that he is thoroughly informed, that it was but the Practice of some corrupt Persons about him, during the time of his Sickness, altogether without his Consent or Privity.

But howsoever these things do interefs his Grace in his particular, yet he knoweth well, that the higher Bond that tyeth him to procure by all means the Safety and Welfare of his loving Subjects, doth dis-interefs him of these Obligations of Gratitude, otherwise than thus: That if his Grace be forced to make a War, he do it without Passion, or Ambition.

For the consequence of this Action towards this Kingdom, it is much as the French Kings intention is. For if it be no more, but to range his Subjects to Reason, who bear themselves stout upon the Strength of the Duke of Brittain, it is nothing to us. But if it be in the French King's purpose, or if it should not be in his purpose, yet if it shall follow all one as if it were sought, that the French King shall make a Province of Brittain, and joyn it to the Crown of France: then it is worthy the consideration, how this may import England, as well in the Increase of the greatness of France, by the Addition of such a Country, that stretcheth his Boughes unto our Seas, as in depriving this Nation, and leaving it naked of so firm and assured Confederates, as the Brittains have always been.

For then it will come to pass, that whereas not long since, this Realm was mighty upon the Continent, first in Territory, and after in Alliance, in respect of Burgundy and Brittain, which were Confederates indeed, but dependant Confederates; now the one being already cast, partly into the Greatness of France, and partly into that of Austria, the other is like wholly to be cast into the greatness of France, and this Island shall remain confined in Effect within the Salt Waters, and Girt about with the Coast-Countries of two Mighty Monarchs.

For the Example, it resteth likewise upon the same Question, upon the French King's Intent. For if Brittain be carried and swallowed up by France, as the World abroad (apt to impute and construe the Actions of Princes to Ambition) conceive it will; then it is an Example very dangerous and universal, that the lesser Neighbour Estate should be devoured of the greater.
For this may be the Case of Scotland towards England; of Portugal, towards Spain; of the smaller Estates of Italy, towards the greater; and so of Germany; or as if some of you of the Commons, might not live and dwell safely, besides some of these great Lords. And the bringing in of this Example, will be chiefly laid to the King's Charge, as to him that was most interefsed and most able to forbid it. But then on the other Side, there is so fair a Pretext on the French King's Part (and yet Pretext is never wanting to Power) in regard the danger imminent to his own Estate is such, as may make this Enterprize seem rather a Work of Necessity, than of Ambition, as doth in reason correct the Danger of the Example. For that the Example of that which is done in a Man's own Defence, cannot be dangerous; because it is in another's Power to avoid it. But in all this Business, the King remits himself to your Grave and Mature Advice, whereupon he purposeth to rely.

1488.

He again asks their Advice.

This was the Effect of the Lord Chancellor's Speech touching the Cause of Brittain: For the King had commanded him to carry it so, as to affect the Parliament towards the Business; but without engaging the King in any expresse Declaration.

The Chancellor went on:

FOR that which may concern the Government at home, the King hath commanded me to say unto you; That he thinketh there was never any King (for the small time that he hath reign'd) had greater and juster Cause of the two contrary Passions

 " Doings.

It was no hard Matter to dispose and affect the Parliament in this Business; as well in respect of the Emulation between the Nations, The Emuand the Envy at the late growth of the French lation be-Monarchy; as in regard of the Danger to suf- tween the fer the French to make their Approaches upon English England, by obtaining so goodly a Maritime Pro- and the vince, full of Sea-Towns, and Havens, that French.
 might do Mischief to the English, either by Invasion or by interruption of Traffick. The Parliament was also moved with the Point of Oppression; for altho' the French seem'd to speak reason, yet Arguments are ever with Multitudes too weak for Suspicions. Wherefore they did advise the King, roundly to embrace the Brit- tons Quarrel, and to send them speedy Aids, and with much alacrity and forwardness granted to the King a great Rate of Subsidy in Contemplation of these Aids. But the King both to keep a Decency towards the French King, to whom he profess'd himself to be obliged,
 and indeed desirous rather to shew War, than to make it; sent new solemn Ambassadors to in-timiate unto him, the Decree of his Estates, and to iterate his Motion, that the French would desist from Hostility; or if War must follow, to desire him to take it in good part, if at the Motion of his People, who were sensible of the Cause of the Britons as their ancient Friends, and Confederates, he did send them Succours;
 with Protestation nevertheless, that to save all Treaties and Laws of Friendship, he had limited his Force, to proceed in Aid of the Britons, but in no wise to War upon the French, otherwise than as they maintain'd the Possession of Britain.
 But before this formal Ambassage arriv'd, the Party of the Duke had receiv'd a great blow, and grew to manifest Declination. For near the Town of St. Alban in Britain, a Battel had been given, where the Britons were overthrown, and the Duke of Orleanse, and the Prince of Orange taken Prisoners, there being slain on the Britons part Six thousand Men, and amongst them the Lord Woodville, and almost all his Soldiers valiantly fighting. And of the French part One thousand two hundred, with their Leader James Galeot, a great Commander.

When the News of this Battel came over into England, it was time for the King (who now had no Subterfuge to continue further Treaty, and saw before his Eyes, that Britain went so speedily for lost, contrary to his Hopes, knowing also that with his People and Foreigners both, he sustained no small Envy and Dis-reputation for his former Delays) to dispatch with all possible speed his Succours into Britain; which he did under the Conduct of Robert Lord Brook, to the Number of Eight thousand choice Men, and well arm'd; who having a fair Wind, in few Hours landed in Britain, and joyned themselves forthwith to those Briton Forces, that remained after the Defeat, and march'd straight on to find the Enemy, and incamped fast by them. The French wisely Husbanding the Possession of a Victory, and well acquainted with the Courage of the English, especially when they 1488. are fresh, kept themselves within their Trenches, being strongly lodged, and resolved not to give Battel. But mean while, to harrafs and weary the English, they did upon all Advantages set upon them with their Light Horse; wherein nevertheless they received commonly loss, especially by means of the English Archers.

But upon these Atchievements Francis, Duke of Britain, deceased; an Accident that the King might easily have foreseen, and ought to have reckon'd upon, and provided for; but that the Point of Reputation, when News first came of the Battel lost (that somewhat must be done) did over-bear the Reason of War.

The Causes of the Loss of Bretagne.

After the Duke's Decease, the principal Persons of Britain, partly bought, partly through Faction, put all things into Confusion; so as the English not finding Head or Body with whom to joyn their Forces, and being in Jealousy of Friends, as well as in Danger of Enemies, and the Winter begun, return'd Home five Months after their Landing. So the Battel of St. Alban, the Death of the Duke, and the Retire of the English Succours were (after some time) the Causes of the Loss of that Dutchy; which Action some accounted as a Blemish of the King's Judgment; but most but as the Misfortune of his Times.

But howsoever the temporary Fruit of the Parliament in their Aid and Advice given for Britain, took not, nor prospered not; yet the lasting Fruit of Parliament, which is good and wholsom Laws, did prosper, and doth yet continue to this Day. For according to the Lord Chancellor's Admonition, there were that Parliament divers excellent Laws ordained, concerning the Points which the King recommended.

Court of Star-Chamber confirmed. Star-chamber Court described. What Pleas belong to every Court. The Power and Description of the Court of Chancery.

First, The Authority of the Star-Chamber, which before subsisted by the Ancient Common Laws of the Realm, was confirm'd in certain Cases by Act of Parliament. This Court is one of the Sagest and Noblest Institutions of this Kingdom. For in the Distribution of Courts of Ordinary Justice (besides the High Court of Parliament) in which Distribution the King's Bench holdeth the Pleas of the Crown, the Common-Place, Pleas Civil, the Exchequer Pleas concerning the King's Revenue, and the Chancery the Prætorian Power for mitigating the Rigour of Law, in Case of Extremity, by the Conscience of a good Man; there was nevertheless always reserv'd a High and Preheminent Power to the King's Council, in Causes that might in Example, or Consequence, concern the State of the Commonwealth, which if they were Criminal, the Council used to Sit in the Chamber, call'd the Star-Chamber; if Civil, in the White-Chamber, or White-hall. And as the Chancery had the Prætorian Power for Equity; so the Star-Chamber had the Censorian Power for Offences, under the degree of Capital. This Court of Star-Chamber is compounded of good Elements; for it consisteth of Four kinds of Persons: Councillors, Peers, Prelates, and Chief Judges. It discerneth also principally of Four kinds of Causes; Forces, Frauds, Crimes various of Stellation, and the Inchoations or Middle Acts towards Crimes Capital, or Heinous, not actually committed or perpetrated. But that which was principally aimed at by this Act was Force, and the two chief Supports of Force, Combination of Multitudes, and Maintenance or Headship of great Persons.

From the general Peace of the Country, the King's Care went on to the Peace of the King's House, and the Security of his great Officers and Counsellors. But this Law was somewhat of a strange Composition and Temper. That if any of the King's Servants under the degree of a Lord, do conspire the Death of any of the King's Council, or Lord of the Realm, it is made Capital. This Law was thought to be procur'd by the Lord Chancellor, who being a stern and haughty Man, and finding he had some Mortal Enemies in Court, provided for his own Safety; drowning the Envy of it in a general Law, by communicating the Privilege with all other Councillors and Peers, and yet not daring to extend it further, than to the King's Servants in Check-Roll, lest it should have been too harsh to the Gentlemen, and other Commons of the Kingdom; who might have thought their Ancient Liberty, and the Clemency of the Laws of England invaded, If the Will in any Case of Felony should be made the Deed. And yet the reason which the Act yieldeth (that is to say, That he that Conspireth the Death of Councillors may be thought indirectly, and by a mean, to conspire the Death of the King himself) is indifferent to all Subjects, as well as to Servants in Court. But it seemeth this sufficed to serve the Lord Chancellor's turn at this time. But yet he lived to need a General Law, for that he grew afterwards as odious to the Country, as he was then to the Court.

From the Peace of the King's House, the King's Care extended to the Peace of Private Houses and Families. For there was an excellent Moral Law moulded thus; The taking and carrying away of Women forcibly, and against their will (except Female-wards and Bondwomen) was made Capital. The Parliament wisely and justly conceiving, that the obtaining of Women by force into Possession (howsoever afterwards Assent might follow by Allurements) was but a Rape drawn forth in length, because the first Force drew on all the rest.

A Law against taking away Women by Force.

There was made also another Law for Peace in general, and repressing of Murthers and Man-slaughters, and was in Amendment of the Common Laws of the Realm, being this: That whereas by the Common Law, the King's Suit in case of Homicide, did expect, The Year and the Day, allowed to the Parties Suit by way of Appeal, and that it was found by Experience, that the Party was many times compounded with, and many times wearied with the Suit, so that in the end such Suit was let fall, and by that time the Matter was in a manner forgotten, and thereby Prosecution at the King's Suit by Indictment (which is ever best, Flagrante crimine) neglected; it was ordain'd, That the Suit by Indictment might be taken as well at any time within the Year and the Day, as after, not prejudicing nevertheless the Parties Suit.

Laws about Murder and Man-slaughter.

The King began also then, as well in Wisdom as in Justice to pare a little the Privilege of Clergy, ordaining, That Clerks convicted should be burn'd in the Hand; both because they might taste of some corporal Punishment, and that they might carry a Brand of Infamy. But for this good Act's sake, the King himself was after branded by Perkin's Proclamation, for an execrable Breaker of the Rites of Holy Church.

The Privileges of the Clergy Abridg'd.

Another Law was made for the better Peace of the Country; by which Law the King's Officers and Farmors were to forfeit their Places and Holds, in case of unlawful Retainer, or partaking in Routs and unlawful Assemblies.

These were the Laws that were made for repressing of Force, which those times did chiefly require; and were so prudently framed, as they 1488. Made a Capital Crime for any of the King's Servants, to conspire the Death of any of the King's Council.

1488. they are found fit for all succeeding Times, and so continue to this Day.

Unlawful Exchanges Prohibited. There were also made good and politick Laws that Parliament against Usury, which is the Bastard Use of Money: And against unlawful Chievances and Exchanges, which is Bastard Usury: And also for the Security of the King's Customs: And for the Employment of the Procedures of Foreign Commodities, brought in by Merchant-Strangers, upon the Native Commodities of the Realm: Together with some other Laws of less importance.

King Richard's Memory honoured in Yorkshire. But howsoever the Laws made in that Parliament did bear good and wholesome Fruit; yet the Subsidy granted at the same time, bare a Fruit, that proved harsh and bitter. All was in- ned at last into the King's Barn; but it was after a Storm. For when the Commissioners entred into the Taxation of the Subsidy in Yorkshire, and the Bishoprick of Duresme; the People upon a suddain grew into great Mutiny, and said openly, that they had endured of late Years a thousand Miseries, and neither could nor would pay the Subsidy. This (no doubt) proceeded not simply of any present Necessity, but much by Reason of the old Humour of those Countries, where the Memory of King Richard was so strong, that it lies like Lees in the bottom of Mens Hearts; and if the Vessel was but stirred, it would come up. And (no doubt) it was partly also by the Instigation of some Factious Malecontents, that bare principal stroke amongst them. Hereupon the Commissioners being somewhat astonished, deferr'd the matter unto the Earl of Northumberland, who was the principal Man of Authority in those Parts. The Earl forthwith wrote unto the Court, signifying to the King plainly enough in what Flame he found the People of those Countries, and praying the King's Direction. The King wrote back peremptorily, That he would not have one Penny abated, of that which had been granted to him by Parliament, both because it might encourage other Countries to pray the like Release, or Mitigation, and chiefly because he would never endure, that the base Multitude should frustrate the Authority of the Parliament, wherein their Votes and Consents were concluded. Upon this dispatch from Court, the Earl assembled the principal Justices and Free-holders of the Country; and speaking to them in that imperious Language wherein the King had written to him, which needed not (save that an Harsh business was unfortunately fallen into the Hands of a Harsh-man) did not only irritate the People, but make them conceive, by the Stoutness and Haughtiness of delivery of the King's Errand; that himself was the Author or principal Perfwader of that Counsel. Whereupon the meaner sort routed together, and suddainly assailing the Earl in his House, slew him, and divers of his Servants. And rested not there, but creating for their Leader Sir John Egremont, a factious Person, and one that had of a long time born an ill Talent towards the King; and being animated also by a Base Fellow, called John a Chamber, a very Boufescu, who bare much sway amongst the vulgar and popular, entred into open Rebellion, and gave out in flat Terms, that they would go against King Henry, and fight with him for the maintenance of their Liberties.

When the King was advertised of this new Insurrection (being almost a Fever, that took him every Year) after his manner little troubled therewith, he sent Thomas Earl of Surry (whom he had a little before not only released out of the Tower, and pardoned, but also received to Special Favour) with a Competent Power against the Rebels; who fought with the Principal Band of them, and defeated them, and took alive John a Chamber, their Firebrand. As for Sir John Egremont, he fled into Flanders, to the Lady Margaret of Burgundy; whose Palace was the Sanctuary and Receptacle of all Traitors against the King. John a Chamber was executed at York, in great State; for he was hanged upon a Gibbet raised a Stage higher in the midst of a Square Gallows, as a Traitor Paramount, and a number of his Men that were his chief Complices, were hanged upon the lower Story round about him; and the rest were generally pardoned. Neither did the King himself omit his Custom, to be first or second in all his Warlike Exploits; making good his Word, which was usual with him when he heard of Rebels; that He desired but to see them. For immediately after he had sent down the Earl of Surry, he marched towards them himself in Person. And although in his Journey he heard News of the Victory, yet he went on as far as York, to pacifie and settle those Countries, And that done returned to London, leaving the Earl of Surry for his Lieutenant in the Northern Parts, and Sir Richard Tunstall for his principal Commissioner, to levy the Subsidy, whereof he did not remit a Denyer.

About the same time that the King lost so good a Servant, as the Earl of Northumberland, he lost likewise a faithful Friend and Allie of James the Third King of Scotland, by a miserable Disaster. For this unfortunate Prince, after a long smother of Discontent, and Hatred of many of his Nobility and People, breaking forth at times into Seditions and Alterations of Court, was at last distressed by them, having taken Arms, and surpris'd the Person of Prince James his Son, partly by Force, partly by Threats, that they would otherwise deliver up the Kingdom to the King of England, to shadow their Rebellion, and to be the Titular and painted Head of those Arms. Whereupon the King (finding himself too weak) sought unto King Henry, as also unto the Pope, and the King of France, to compose those Troubles, between him and his Subjects. The Kings accordingly interposed their Mediation in a round and Princely manner: Not only by way of Request and Perswasion, but also by way of Protestation of Menace; declaring, that they thought it to be the Common Cause of all Kings, If Subjects should be suffered to give Laws unto their Sovereign; and that they would accordingly resent it, and revenge it. But the Rebels that had shaken off the greater Yoke of Obedience, had likewise cast away the lesser Tye of Respect. And Fury prevailing above Fear, made answer, That there was no talking of Peace, except the King would resign his Crown. Whereupon (Treatie of Accord taking no place) it came to a Battel, at Bannocks-burn by Strivelin. In which Battel the King transported with Wrath and just Indignation, inconsiderately fighting and precipitating the Charge, before his whole Numbers came up to him, was (notwithstanding the contrary expresse and straight Commandment of the Prince his Son) slain in the Pursuit, being fled to a Mill, Situate in the Field, where the Battel was fought.

As for the Pope's Ambassy, which was sent by Adrian De Castello an Italian Legate (and perhaps as those times were might have prevail'd more) it came too late for the Ambassy, but not for the Ambassador. For passing through England, and being honourably entertained, and received of King Henry; (who ever applied himself with much respect to the Sea of Rome) he 1489. fell into great Grace with the King, and great Familiarity and Friendship with Morton the Chancellor. In so much as the King taking a liking to him, and finding him to his Mind, preferred him to the Bishoprick of Hereford, and afterwards to that of Bath and Wells, and employed him in many of his Affairs of State, that had Relation to Rome. He was a Man of great Learning, Wisdom and Dexterity in Business of State; and having not long after ascended to the Degree of Cardinal, paid the King large Tribute of his Gratitude, in diligent and judicious Advertisement of the Occurrences of Italy. Nevertheless in the end of his time, he was Partaker of the Conspiracy, which Cardinal Alphonso Petrucci, and some other Cardinals had plotted against the Life of Pope Leo. And this Offence in it self so hainous, was yet in him aggravated by the Motive thereof; which was not Malice or Discontent, but an aspiring Mind to the Papacy. And in this Height of Impiety there wanted not an intermixture of Levity and Folly; for that (as was generally believed) he was animated to expect the Papacy, by a fatal Mockery, the Prediction of a Sooth-sayer, which was; That one should succeed Pope Leo, whose Name should be Adrian, an aged Man of mean Birth, and of great Learning and Wisdom. By which Character and Figure, he took himself to be describ'd, though it were fulfilled of Adrian the Flemming, Son of a Dutch Brewer, Cardinal of Tortosa, and Preceptor unto Charles the Fifth; the same that not changing his Christen-name, was afterwards called Adrian the Sixth.

But these things happened in the Year following, which was the fifth of this King. But in the end of the fourth Year the King had called again his Parliament, not as it seemeth for any particular Occasion of State. But the former Parliament being ended somewhat suddenly, in regard of the Preparation for Brittain, the King thought he had not remunerated his People sufficiently with good Laws, which evermore was his Retribution for Treasure. And finding by the Insurrection in the North, there was Discontentment abroad, in respect of the Subsidy, he thought it good to give his Subjects yet further Contentment, and Comfort in that kind. Certainly his Times for good Common-wealths Laws did excel. So as he may justly be celebrated for the best Law-giver to this Nation, after King Edward the first. For his Laws (who so marks them well) are deep, and not vulgar; not made upon the Spur of a particular Occasion for the Present, but out of Providence of the Future, to make the Estate of his People still more and more happy; after the manner of the Legislators in Ancient and Heroical Times.

First therefore he made a Law, suitable to his own Acts and Times. For as himself had in his Person and Marriage made a final Concord, in the great Suit and Title for the Crown; so by this Law he settled the like Peace and Quiet in the Private Possessions of the Subjects. Ordaining, That Fines thenceforth should be final, to conclude all Strangers Rights; and that upon Fines levied, and solemnly proclaim'd, the Subject should have his Time of Watch for five Years after his Title accrued; which if he fore-passed, his Right should be bound for ever after; with some Exception nevertheless, of Minors, Married-Women, and such incompetent Persons.

This Statute did in Effect but restore an Ancient Statute of the Realme, which was it self also made but in Affirmance of the Common-Law. The Alteration had been by a Statute, commonly called the Statute of Non-claim, made in the time of Edward the Third. And surely this Law was a kind of Prognostick of the good Peace, which since his time hath (for the most part) continued in this Kingdom, untill this Day. For Statutes of Non-claim are fit for times of War, when Mens Heads are Troubled, that they cannot intend their Estate; but Statutes, that quiet Possessions, are fittest for Times of Peace, to extinguish Suits and Contentions, which is one of the Banes of Peace.

Another Statute was made of singular Policy, for the Population apparently, and (if it be thoroughly considered) for the Souldiery, and Militar Forces of the Realm.

Inclosures at that time began to be more frequent, whereby Arable Land (which could not be manured without People and Families) was turned into Pasture, which was easily rid by a few Herds-men; and Tenancies for Years, Lives, and at Will (whereupon much of the Yeomanry lived) were turned into Demesnes. This bred a decay of People, and (by consequence) a decay of Towns, Churches, Tithes, and the like. The King likewise knew full well, and in no wise forgot, that there ensued with all upon this a Decay and Diminution of Subsidy and Taxes; for the more Gentlemen, ever the lower Books of Subsidies. In remedying of this inconvenience, the King's Wisdom was Admirable, and the Parliament's at that time. Inclosures they would not forbid, for that had been to forbid the Improvement of the Patrimony of the Kingdom; nor Tillage they would not compel, for that was to strive with Nature and Utility. But they took a Course to take away The In-depopulating Inclosures, and depopulating conveniences of Pasturage, and yet not by that Name, or by any Imperious express Prohibition, but by Consequence. The Ordinance was, That all Houses of Husbandry, that were used with twenty Acres of Ground, and upwards, should be maintained and kept up for ever; together with a Competent Proportion of Land to be used and occupied with them; and in no wise to be severed from them, as by another Statute, made afterwards in his Successors time, was more fully declared. This upon Forfeiture to be taken; not by way of Popular Action, but by seizure of the Land it self, by the King and Lords of the Fee, as to half the Profits, till the Houses and Lands were restored. By this means the Houses being kept up, did of necessity enforce a Dweller; and the Proportion of Land for Occupation being kept up, did of necessity enforce that Dweller; not to be a Beggar or Cottager, but a Man of some Substance, that might keep Hinds and Servants, and set the Plough on going. This did wonderfully concern the Might and Manner-hood of the Kingdom, to have Farms, as it were of a Standard sufficient to maintain an able Body out of Penury, and did in effect amortize a great part of the Lands of the Kingdom unto the Hold and Occupation of the Yeomanry or Middle-People, of a Condition between Gentlemen, and Cottagers, or Peasants? Now, how much this did advance the Militar Power of the Kingdom, is apparent by the true Principles of War, and the Examples of other Kingdoms. For it hath been held by the general Opinion of Men of best Judgment in the Wars (howsoever some few have varied, and that it may receive some distinction of Case) that the Principal Strength of an Army consisteth in the Infantry or Foot. And to make good Infantry, it requireth Men bred, not in a servile or indigent Fashion, but in some free and plentiful

 Cottagers but Hous'd Beggars. to Noble-men and Gentlemen, and that the Husband-men and Plough-men be but as their Work-folks and Labourers, or else mere Cottagers, (which are but Hous'd-Beggars) you may have a good Cavalry, but never good stable Bands of Foot; like to Coppice-Woods, that if you leave in them Staddles too thick, they will run to Bushes and Briars, and have little clean Underwood. And this is to be seen in France, and Italy, and some other Parts abroad, where in Effect all is Nobles, or Pefantry, I speak of People out of Towns, and no middle People;
 and therefore no good Forces of Foot: Infomuch, as they are inforced to imploy Mercenary Bands, of Switzers and the like, for their Battalions of Foot: Whereby also it comes to pass, that those Nations have much People, and few Souldiers.
 Whereas the King saw, that contrariwise it would follow, that England though much less in Territory, yet should have infinitely more Souldiers of their Native Forces, than those other Nations have. Thus did the King secretly Sow Hidra's Teeth, whereupon (according to the Poets fiction) should rise up Armed Men for the Service of this Kingdom.

The English Navigation ad-vanc'd. The King also (having care to make his Realm potent, as well by Sea as by Land) for the better maintainance of the Navy, ordained; That Wines and Woods from the Parts of Gascoign and Langue- dock, should not be brought but in English Bottoms; Bowing the Ancient Policy of this Estate, from consideration of Plenty, to consideration of Power. For that almost all the Ancient Statutes incite by all means Merchant-Strangers, to bring in all sorts of Commodities; having for end Cheapness, and not looking to the Point of State concerning the Naval-Power.

The King also made a Statute in that Parliament Monitory and Minatory, towards Justices of Peace, that they should duly execute their Office, inviting Complaints against them, first to their Fellow-Justices, then to the Justices of Assise, then to the King or Chancellor; and that a Proclamation, which he had published of that Tenor, should be read in open Sessions four times a Year, to keep them awake. Meaning also to have his Laws executed, and thereby to reap either Obedience or Forfeitures; (wherein towards his latter Times he did decline too much to the left Hand) he did ordain Remedy against the Practice that was grown in use, to stop and damp Informations upon Penal Laws, by procuring Informations by Collusion to be put in by the Confederates of the Delinquents, to be faintly prosecuted, and let fall at Pleasure, and pleading them in Bar of the Informations, which were prosecuted with Effect.

He made also Laws for the Correction of the Mint, and counterfeiting of Foreign Cohn currant. And that no payment in Gold, should be made to any Merchant-Stranger, the better to keep Treasure within the Realm, for that Gold was the Mettal that lay in least Room.

His Statutes for encouraging
 Woollen
 Drapery. He made also Statutes for the Maintenance of Drapery, and the keeping of Wools within the Realm; and not only so, but for stinting, and limiting the Prices of Cloth, one for the Finer, and another for the Courser sort. Which I note, both because it was a rare thing to set Prices by Statute, especially upon our Home-Commodities; and because of the Wise Model of this Act, not prescribing Prices, but stinting them not to 1489. exceed a Rate, that the Clothier might drape accordingly as he might afford.

Divers other good Statutes were made that Parliament, but these were the Principal. And here I do desire those, into whose Hands this Work shall fall, that they do take in good part my long insisting upon the Laws, that were made in this King's Reign. Whereof I have these Reasons; Both because it was the preheminent Vertue and Merit of this King, to whose Memory I do honour; and because it hath some Correspondence to my Person; but chiefly, because (in my Judgment) it is some Defect even in the best Writers of History, that they do not often enough summarily deliver and set down the most Memorable Laws, that passed in the Times whereof they write, being indeed the Principal Acts of Peace. For though they may be had in Original Books of Law themselves, yet that informeth not the Judgment of Kings and Councillors, and Persons of Estate, so well as to see them describ'd, and entred into the Table and Pourtrait of the Times.

About the same time, the King had a Loan from the City of Four thousand pounds; which was double to that they lent before, (a) and was duely and orderly pay'd back at the Day, as the former likewise had been. The King ever chosing rather to borrow too soon, than to pay too late, and so keeping up his Credit.

Neither had the King yet cast off his Cares and Hopes touching Brittain, but thought to Master the Occasion by Policy, though his Arms had been unfortunate, and to bereave the French King of the Fruit of his Victory. The Sum of his Design was, to encourage Maximilian to go on with his Suit, for the Marriage of Ann, the Heir of Brittain, and to Aid him to the Consummation thereof. But the Affairs of Maximilian were at that time in great Trouble and Combustion, by a Rebellion of his Subjects in Flan- ders; especially those of Bruges and Gant, whereof the Town of Bruges (at such time as Maximilian was there in Person) had suddenly Arm'd in Tumult, and slain some of his Principal Officers, and taken himself Prisoner, and held him in Durance, till they had enforced him, and some of his Councillors, to take a solemn Oath, to pardon all their Offences, and never to question and revenge the same in time to come. Nevertheless Frederick the Emperor would not suffer this Reproach and Indignity offer'd to his Son to pass, but made sharp War upon Flanders, to reclaim and chastise the Rebels. But the Lord Ravenstein, a principal Person about Maximilian, and one that had taken the Oath of Abolition with his Master, pretending the Religion thereof, but indeed upon private Ambition, and (as it was thought) instigated and corrupted from France, forlook the Emperor and Maximilian his Lord, and made himself an Head of the Popular Party, and seiz'd upon the Towns of Ipre and Sluce, with both the Castles, And forthwith sent to the Lord Cordes, Governour of Picardy under the French King, to desire Aid, and to move him, that he on the behalf of the French King would be Protector of the united Towns, and by Force of Arms reduce the rest. The Lord Cordes was ready to embrace the Occasion, which was partly of his own setting, and sent forthwith greater Forces, than it had been possible for him to raise on the sudden, if he had not looked for such a Summons before, in Aid of the Lord Ravenstein, and the Flemmings, with Instructions to invest the Towns between France and

(a) The King borrowed of every Alderman 20*l.* and of the Chamber of London 9082*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.* Hollinhead.

1489. Bruges. The French Forces besieged a little Town called Dixmue, where part of the Flemish Forces joyned with them. While they lay at this Siege, the King of England, upon pretence of the safety of the English Pale about Calice, but in truth being loth that Maximilian should become contemptible, and thereby be shaken off by the States of Brittain about this Marriage, sent over the Lord Morley with a thousand Men unto the Lord Daubigny, then Deputy of Calice, with secret Instructions to aid Maximilian, and to raise the Siege of Dixmue. The Lord Daubigny (giving it out that all was for the Strengthening of the English Marches) drew out of the Garrisons of Calice, Hammer, and Guines, to the Number of a Thousand Men more. So that with the fresh Succours that came under the Conduct of the Lord Morley, they made up to the Number of two Thousand, or better. Which Forces joyned with some Companies of Almaines, put themselves into Dixmue, not perceived by the Enemies; and passing through the Town with some Re-inforcement (from the Forces that were in the Town) assailed the Enemies Camp, negligently guarded, as being out of Fear; where there was a bloody Fight, in which the English and their Partakers obtained the Victory, and slew to the Number of eight Thousand Men, with the loss on the English part of a Hundred or thereabouts; amongst whom was the Lord Morley. They took also their great Ordnance, with much rich Spoils, which they carried to Newport, whence the Lord Daubigny returned to Calice, leaving the hurt Men, and some other Voluntaries in Newport. But the Lord Cordes being at Ipre with a great power of Men, thinking to recover the Loss and Disgrace of the Fight at Dixmue, came presently on, and laid down before Newport and besieged it; and after some days Siege, he resolved to try the Fortune of an Assault: Which he did one day, and succeeded therein so far, that he had taken the principal Tower and Fort in that City, and planted upon it the French Banner. Whence nevertheless they were presently beaten forth by the English, by the help of some fresh Succours of Archers arriving by good Fortune (at the instant) in the Haven of Newport. Whereupon the Lord Cordes discouraged, and measuring the new Succours (which were small) by the Success (which was great) levied his Siege. By this means, Matters grew more exasperate between the two Kings of England and France, for that in the War of Flanders, the Auxiliary Forces of French and English were much blooded one against another. Which Blood rankled the more, by the vain Words of the Lord Cordes, that declared himself an open Enemy of the English, beyond that that appertained to the present Service; making it a common By-word of his, That he could be content to lie in Hell seven Years, so he might win Calice from the English.

The Lord Cordes's hatred to the English.

A New Ceremony of Marriage.

The King having thus upheld the Reputation of Maximilian, advised him now to press on his Marriage with Brittain to a Conclusion. Which Maximilian accordingly did, and so far forth prevailed both with the young Lady, and with the principal Persons about her, as the Marriage was consummate by Proxy, with a Ceremony at that time in these Parts new. For she was not only publicly contracted, but stated as a Bride, and solemnly Bedded; and after she was laid, there came in Maximilian's Ambassador with Letters of Procuration, and in the presence of sundry Noble Personages, Men and Women, put his Leg (stript naked to the Knee) between the Espousal Sheets; to the end, that that Ceremony might be thought to amount to a Consummation and actual Knowledge. This done, Maximilian (whose Property was to leave things then, when they were almost come to Perfection, and to end them by Imagination; like ill Archers, that draw not their Arrows up to the Head: and who might as easily have bedded the Lady himself, as to have made a Play and Disguise of it) thinking now all assured, neglected for a time his further Proceeding, and intended his Wars. Mean while, the French King (consulting with his Divines, and finding that this pretended Consummation was rather an Invention of Court, than any ways valid by the Laws of the Church) went more really to work, and by secret Instruments and cunning Agents, as well Matrons about the young Lady as Councillors, first sought to remove the Point of Religion and Honour out of the Mind of the Lady herself, wherein there was a double Labour. For Maximilian was not only contracted unto the Lady, but Maximilian's Daughter was likewise contracted to King Charles. So as the Marriage halted upon both Feet, and was not clear on either Side: But for the Contract with King Charles, the Exception lay plain and fair; for that Maximilian's Daughter was under Years of Consent, and so not bound by Law, but a power of Disagreement left to either part. But for the Contract made by Maximilian with the Lady herself, they were harder driven: Having nothing to alledge, but that it was done without the consent of her Sovereign Lord King Charles, whose Ward and Client she was, and He to her in place of a Father; and therefore it was void, and of no force, for want of such Consent. Which Defect (they said) tho' it would not evacuate a Marriage, after Cohabitation, and Actual Consummation; yet it was enough to make void a Contract. For as for the pretended Consummation, they made Sport with it, and said, That it was an Argument, that Maximilian was a Widdower, and a cold Wooer, that could content himself to be a Bridegroom by Deputy, and would not make a little Journey, to put all out of Question. So that the young Lady, wrought upon by these Reasons, finely instilled by such as the French King (who spared for no Rewards or Promises) had made on his Side; and allured likewise by the present Glory and Greatness of King Charles, (being also a young King, and a Batchellor) and loth to make her Country the Seat of a long and miserable War; secretly yielded to accept of King Charles. But during this secret Treaty with the Lady, the better to save it from Blasts of Opposition and Interruption, King Charles resorting to his wonted Arts, and thinking to carry the Marriage as he had carried the Wars, by entertaining the King of England in vain belief, sent a Solemn Ambassage by Francis Lord of Luxemburg, Charles Marignan and Robert Gaguier, General of the Order of the Bonnes Hommes of the Trinity, to treat a Peace and League with the King; accoupling it with an Article in the Nature of a Request, that the French King might with the King's good Will (according unto his Right of Seigniorie and Tutelage) dispose of the Marriage of the young Dutcheffs of Brittain, as he should think good; offering by a Judicial Proceeding to make Void the Marriage of Maximilian by Proxy. Also all this while the better to amuse the World, he did continue in his Court and Custody the Daughter of Maximilian, who formerly had been sent unto him, to be bred and educated in France; not dismissing or renvoying her, but contrariwise professing and giving out strongly, that he meant to proceed with that Match. And that for

The Diffimulation of the French King.

1490. for the Dutcheſs of Britain, he deſired only to preſerve his Right of Seigniorie, and to give her in Marriage to ſome ſuch Allie, as might depend upon him.

When the three Commiſſioners came to the Court of England, they deliver'd their Ambaſſage unto the King, who remitted them to his Council; where ſome days after they had Audience, and made their Propoſition by the Prior of the Trinity (who tho' he were Third in Place, yet was held the beaſt Speaker of them) to this Effect.

Speech.

"MY Lords, the King our Maſter, the greateſt and mightieſt King that reigned in France ſince Charles the Great (whoſe Name he beareth), hath nevertheleſs thought it no Diſparagement to his Greatneſs, at this time to propound a Peace, yea, and to pray a Peace with the King of England. For which Purpoſe he hath ſent us his Commiſſioners, inſtructed and enabled with full and ample Power, to treat and conclude; giving us further in Charge, to open in ſome other Buſineſs the Secrets of his own Intentions. Theſe be indeed the precious Love-Tokens between great Kings, to communicate one with another the true ſtate of their Affairs, and to paſs by nice Points of Honour, which ought not to give Law unto Affection. This I do aſſure your Lordſhips, It is not poſſible for you to imagine the true and cordial Love that the King our Maſter beareth to your Sovereign, except you were near him, as we are. He uſeth his Name with ſo great reſpect; He remembreth their firſt Acquaintance at Paris with ſo great Contentment; nay, he never ſpeaks of him, but that preſently he falls into Diſcourſe of the Miſeries of great Kings, in that they cannot converſe with their Equals, but with Servants. This Affection to your King's Perſon and Vertues, God hath put into the Heart of our Maſter, no doubt for the good of Chriſtendom, and for Purpoſes yet unknown to us all. For other Root it cannot have, ſince it was the ſame to the Earl of Richmond, that it is now to the King of England. This is therefore the firſt Motive that makes our King to deſire Peace, and League with your Sovereign: Good Affection, and ſomewhat that he finds in his own Heart. This Affection is alſo arm'd with reaſon of Eſtate. For our King doth in all Candour and Frankneſs of dealing open himſelf unto you; that having an honourable, yea, and a holy Purpoſe to make a Voyage and War in remote Parts, he conſidereth that it will be of no ſmall effect, in point of Reputation to his Enterprize, if it be known Abroad, that he is in good Peace with all his Neighbour Princes, and ſpecially with the King of England, whom for good Cauſes he eſteemeth moſt.

"But now (my Lords) give me leave to uſe a few words to remove all Scruples and Miſunderſtandings between your Sovereign and ours, concerning ſome late Actions; which if they be not cleared, may perhaps hinder this Peace. To the end, that for Matter paſt, neither King may conceive Unkindneſs of other, nor think the other conceiveth Unkindneſs of him. The late Actions are two; That of Britain and that of Flanders. In both which, it is true, that the Subjects Swords of both Kings have encountred and ſtricken, and the Ways and Inclinations alſo of the two Kings, in reſpect of their Confederates and Allies, have ſepered.

1490. "For that of Britain; The King your Sovereign knoweth beſt what hath paſſed. It was a War of Neceſſity on our Maſter's part. And tho' the Motives of it were ſharp and piquant as could be, yet did he make that War rather with an Olive-Branch than a Laurel-Branch in his Hand, more deſiring Peace than Victory. Beſides, from time to time he ſent (as it were) Blank-Papers to your King, to write the Conditions of Peace. For tho' both his Honour and Safety went upon it, yet he thought neither of them too precious, to put into the King of England's hands. Neither doth your King on the other Side make any Unfriendly Interpretation, of your King's ſending of Succours to the Duke of Britain; for the King knoweth well, that many things muſt be done of Kings for Satisfaction of their People, and it is not hard to diſcern what is a King's own. But this Matter of Britain is now (by the Act of God) ended and paſſed; and (as the King hopeth) like the way of a Ship in the Sea, without leaving any Impreſſion in either of the Kings Minds; as he is ſure for his part it hath not done in his.

"For the Action of Flanders; As the former of Britain was a War of Neceſſity, ſo this was a War of Juſtice; which with a good King is of equal Neceſſity, with danger of Eſtate, for elſe he ſhould leave to be a King. The Subjects of Burgundy are Subjects in Chief to the Crown of France, and their Duke the Homager and Vaſſal of France. They had wont to be good Subjects, howſoever Maximilian hath of late diſtemper'd them. They fled to the King for Juſtice, and Deliverance from Oppreſſion. Juſtice he could not deny; Purchase he did not ſeek. This was good for Maximilian, if he could have ſeen it in People muſtined to arreſt Fury, and prevent Deſpair. My Lords, it may be this I have ſaid is needleſs, ſave that the King our Maſter is tender in any thing, that may but glance upon the Friendſhip of England. The Amity between the two Kings (no doubt) ſtands entire and inviolate. And that their Subjects Swords have claiſhed, it is nothing unto the publick Peace of the Crowns; it being a thing very uſual in Auxiliary Forces of the beſt and ſtraiteſt Confederates, to meet and draw blood in the Field. Nay, many times there be Aids of the ſame Nation on both ſides, and yet it is not (for all that) A Kingdom divided in it ſelf.

"It reſteth (my Lords) that I impart unto you a Matter, that I know your Lordſhips all will much rejoyce to hear; as that which importeth the Chriſtian Commonweal more than any Action that hath hapned of long time. The King our Maſter hath a Purpoſe and Determination, to make War upon the Kingdom of Naples; being now in the Poſſeſſion of a Baſtardſhip of Aragon, but appertaining unto his Maſteſty, by clear and undoubted Right; which if he ſhould not by juſt Arms ſeek to recover, he could neither acquit his Honour, nor Anſwer it to his People. But his Noble and Chriſtian Thoughts reſt not here. For his Reſolution and Hope is, to make the Reconqueſt of Naples, but as a Bridge to tranſport his Forces into Grecia; and not to ſpare Blood or Treafure (if it were to the impawning of his Crown, and diſpeopling of France) till either he hath Overthrown the Empire of the Ottomans, or taken it in his Way to Paradiſe. The King knoweth well, that this is a Deſign, that could not ariſe in the Mind of any

any King, that did not stedfastly look up unto God, whose Quarrel this is, and from whom cometh both the Will and the Deed. But yet it is agreeable to the Person that he beareth (tho' unworthy) of the Thrice-Christian King, and the eldest Son of the Church. Whereunto he is also invited by the Example (in more Ancient time) of King Henry IV. of England, (the first renown'd King of the House of Lancaster; Ancestor, tho' not Progenitor to your King) who had a Purpose towards the End of his Time (as you know better) to make an Expedition into the Holy-Land; and by the Example also (present before his Eyes) of that Honourable and Religious War which the King of Spain now maketh, and hath almost brought to Perfection, for the recovery of the Realm of Granada from the Moors. And altho' this Enterprize may seem vast and unmeasur'd, for the King to attempt that by his own Forces, wherein heretofore a Conjunction of most of the Christian Princes hath found Work enough; yet his Majesty wisely considereth, that sometimes smaller Forces being united under one Command, are more effectual in Proof (tho' not so promising in Opinion and Fame) than much greater Forces, variously compounded by Associations and Leagues; which commonly in a short time after their Beginnings, turn to Dissociations and Divisions. But my (Lords) that which is as a Voice from Heaven that called the King to this Enterprize, is a Rent at this time in the House of the Ottomans. I do not say, but there hath been Brother against Brother in that House before, but never any that had refuge to the Arms of the Christians, as now hath Gemes, (Brother unto Bajazeth, that reigneth) the far braver Man of the two; the other being between a Monk and a Philosopher, and better read in the Alecoran and Averroes, than Able to wield the Scepter of so Warlike an Empire. This therefore is the King our Master's memorable and Heroical Resolution for an Holy War. And because he carrieth in this the Person of a Christian Soldier, as well as of a great Temporal Monarch; he beginneth with Humility, and is content for this Cause to beg Peace at the hands of other Christian Kings. There remaineth only rather a Civil Request, than any Essential part of our Negotiation, which the King maketh to the King your Sovereign. The King (as the World knoweth) is Lord in Chief of the Duchy of Brittain. The Marriage of the Heir belongeth to him as Guardian. This is a private Patrimonial Right, and no Business of Estate: yet nevertheless (to run a fair Course with your King; whom he desires to make another Himself, and to be one and the same thing with him) his Request is, That with the King's Favour and Consent, he may dispose of her Marriage, as he thinketh good, and make void the intruded and pretended Marriage of Maximilian, according to Justice. This (my Lords) is all that I have to say, desiring your Pardon for my Weakness in the Delivery.

Thus did the French Ambassadors with great shew of their King's Affection, and many sugar'd Words seek to adulce all Matters between the two Kings, having two Things for their Ends; The one, to keep the King quiet till the Marriage of Brittain was past, and this was but a Summer Fruit, which they thought was almost ripe and would be soon gathered. The other was more lasting; and that was to put him into such a temper as he might be no Disturbance or Impediment to the Voyage for Italy. The Lords of the Council were Silent; and said only, That they knew the Ambassadors would look for no Answer, till they had reported to the King; and so they rose from Council. The King could not well tell what to think of the Marriage of Brittain. He saw plainly the Ambition of the French King was to impatronize himself of the Duchy; but he wondred he would bring into his House a litigious Marriage, especially considering who was his Successor. But weighing one thing with another, he gave Brittain for lost; but resolv'd to make his Profit of this Business of Brittain, as a Quarrel for War; and that of Naples, as a Wrench and Mean for Peace; being well advertised how strongly the King was bent upon that Action. Having therefore conferred divers times with his Council, and keeping himself somewhat close; he gave a Direction to the Chancellor, for a formal Answer to the Ambassadors, and that he did in the presence of his Council. And after calling the Chancellor to him apart, bad him speak in such Language as was fit for a Treaty that was to end in a Breach; and gave him also a Special Caveat, that he should not use any words, to discourage the Voyage of Italy. Soon after the Ambassadors were sent for to the Council, and the Lord Chancellor spake to them in this sort.

MY Lords Ambassadors, I shall make answer by the King's Commandment, unto the Eloquent Declaration of you my Lord Prior, in a brief and plain manner. The King forgetteth not his former Love and Acquaintance with the King your Master. But of this there needeth no Repetition. For if it be between them as it was, it is well; if there be any Alteration, it is not Words that will make it up. For the Business of Brittain, the King findeth it a little strange that the French King maketh mention of it, as Matter of well deserving at his Hand. For that Deserving was no more, but to make him his Instrument, to surprise one of his best Confederates. And for the Marriage, the King would not meddle in it if your Master would marry by the Book, and not by the Sword. For that of Flanders, if the Subjects of Burgundy had appeal'd to your King, as their Chief Lord, at first, by way of Supplication; it might have had a Shew of Justice. But it was a new Form of Process, for Subjects to imprison their Prince first, and to slay his Officers, and then to be Complainers. The King saith, that sure he is, when the French King, and himself sent to the Subjects of Scotland (that had taken Arms against their King) they both spake in another Stile, and did in Princely manner signify their Detestation of Popular Attentates, upon the Person or Authority of Princes. But my Lords Ambassadors, the King leaveth these two Actions thus: That on the one Side, he hath not received any manner of Satisfaction from you concerning them; and on the other, that he doth not apprehend them so deeply, as in respect of them, to refuse to treat of Peace, if other things may go hand in hand. As for the War of Naples, and the Design against the Turk; the King hath commanded me expressly to say, That he doth wish with all his Heart, to his good

The Lord Chancellor's Answer to the French Ambassadors Speech.

"good Brother the French King, that his Fortunes may succeed according to his Hopes, and honourable Intentions. And whensoever he shall hear, that he is prepared for Grecia, as your Master is pleased now to say, that he beggeth a Peace of the King, so the King will then beg of him a part in that War.

"But now my Lords Ambassadors, I am to propound unto you somewhat on the King's part. The King your Master hath taught our King what to say and demand. You say (my Lord Prior) that your King is resoly'd to recover his Right to Naples, wrongfully detained from him. And that if he should not thus do, he could not acquit his Honour, nor answer it to his People. Think (my Lords) that the King our Master saith the same thing over again to you touching Normandy, Guien, Angeou, yea and the Kingdom of France it self. I cannot express it better than in your own Words: If therefore the French King shall consent, that the King our Master's Title to France (at least Tribute for the same) be handled in the Treaty, the King is content to go on with the rest; otherwise he refuseth to Treat.

The King's Title to the Crown of France renew'd.

THE Ambassadors being somewhat abashed with this Demand, answered in some Heat; That they doubted not, but the King their Sovereign's Sword would be able to maintain his Scepter: And they assured themselves, he neither could nor would yield to any Diminution of the Crown of France either in Territory or Regality. But howsoever, they were too great matters for them to speak of, having no Commission. It was replied; that the King looked for no other Answer from them; but would forth-with send his own Ambassadors to the French King. There was a Question also asked at the Table, Whether the French King would agree to have the disposing of the Marriage of Britain with an Exception and Exclusion, that he should not marry her himself? To which the Ambassadors answered; That it was so far out of their King's Thoughts, as they had received no Instructions touching the same. Thus were the Ambassadors dismissed, all save the Prior; and were followed immediately by Thomas Earl of Ormond, and Thomas Goldenston Prior of Christ Church in Canterbury; who were presently sent over into France. In the mean space, Lionell Bishop of Concordia, was sent as Nuntio from Pope Alexander the sixth to both Kings, to move a Peace between them. For Pope Alexander finding himself pent and lockt up, by a League and Association of the Principal States of Italy, that he could not make his way for the Advancement of his own House (which he immoderately thirsted after) was desirous to trouble the Waters in Italy, that he might fish the better; casting the Net, not out of Saint Peter's, but out of Borgia's Bark. And doubting least the Fears from England, might stay the French King's Voyage into Italy, dispatch'd this Bishop to compose all matters between the two Kings, if he could. Who first repaired to the French King, and finding him well inclined (as he conceiv'd) took on his Journey towards England, and found the English Ambassadors at Calice, on their Way towards the French King. After some Conference with them, he was in Honourable manner transported over into England, where he had Audience of the King. But notwithstanding he had a good Ominous Name to have made a Peace, nothing followed. For in the mean time, the purpose of the French King to marry the Dutchess could be no longer dissembled. Wherefore the English Ambassadors (finding how things went) took their Leaves and returned. And the Prior also was warned from hence, to depart out of England. Who when he turned his back (more like a Pedant, than an Ambassador) dispersed a bitter Libel, in Latin Verse, against the King; unto which the King (though he had nothing of a Pedant) yet was content to cause an answer to be made in like Verse; and that as speaking in his own Person, but in a Style of Scorn and Sport. About this time also was born the King's second Son Henry, who afterward reigned. And soon after followed the Solemnization of the Marriage between Charles and Ann Dutchess of Britain, with whom he received the Dutchy of Britain as her Dowry; the Daughter of Maximilian being a little before sent home. Which when it came to the Ears of Maximilian (who would never believe it till it was done, being ever the Principal in deceiving himself, though in this the French King did very handsomly second it) and tumbling it over and over in his Thoughts, that he should at one Blow (with such a double scorn) be defeated, both of the Marriage of his Daughter, and his own (upon both which he had fixed high Imaginations;) he lost all Patience, and casting off the Respects fit to be continued between great Kings (even when their Blood is hottest, and most risen) fell to bitter Invectives against the Person and Actions of the French King. And (by how much he was less able to do, talking so much the more) spake all the Injuries he could devise of Charles, saying; That he was the most Perfidious Man upon the Earth, and that he had made a Marriage compounded between an Advoutry and a Rape: which was done (he said) by the just Judgment of God, to the end that (the Nullity thereof being so apparent to all the World) the Race of so unworthy a Person might not reign in France. And forthwith he sent Ambassadors as well to the King of England, as to the King of Spain, to incite them to War, and to treat a League offensive against France, promising to concur with great Forces of his own. Hereupon the King of England (going nevertheless his own way) called a Parliament, it being the seventh Year of his Reign; and the first day of opening thereof (sitting under his Cloth of Estate) spake himself unto his Lords, and Commons in this manner.

The King orders a Copy of Verses to be written in answer to some against him. King Henry 8th. Born. The Prince, according to Holinshed was born the 22d. of June 1491. Bretagne annex'd to the Crown of France.

"MY Lords, and you the Commons; when I purposed to make a War in Britain by my Lieutenant, I made Declaration thereof to you by my Chancellor. But now that I mean to make a War upon France in Person, I will declare it to you my self. That War, was to defend another Man's Right, but this is to recover our own; And that ended by Accident, but we hope this shall end in Victory.

The King's Speech to his Parliament.

"The French King troubles the Christian World. That which he hath, is not his own, and yet he seeketh more. He hath invested himself of Britain. He maintaineth the Rebels in Flanders; and he threatneth Italy. For Our Selves, he hath proceeded from Dissimulation, to Neglect; and from Neglect to Contumely. He hath assailed our Confederates: He denyeth our Tribute: In a word, he seeks War. So did not his Father, but sought Peace at our Hands; and so perhaps will he, when good Council or Time, shall make him see as much as his Father did.

"Mean while; let us make his Ambition, our Advantage; and let us not stand upon a few
Vol. H h h h Crowns

1490. "Crowns of Tribute, or Acknowledgment, but (by the Favour of Almighty God) try Our Right for the Crown of France it self; remembering that there hath been a French King Prisoner in England, and a King of England Crowned in France. Our Confederates are not diminished. Burgundy is in a mightier Hand then ever, and never more provoked. Brittain cannot help us, but it may hurt them. New Acquests are more Burthen, than strength. The Male-contents of his own Kingdom have not been Base, Popular nor Titulary Impostors, but of an higher Nature. The King of Spain (doubt ye not) will joyn with us, not knowing where the French Kings Ambition will stay. Our holy Father the Pope, likes no Tramontanes in Italy. But howsoever it be, this Matter of Confederates, is rather to be thought on than reckoned on. For God forbid, but England should be able to get Reason of France, without a Second.

"At the Battels of Cressy, Poitiers, Agincourt, we were of our selves. France hath much People, and few Souldiers. They have no stable Bands of Foot. Some good Horse they have; but those are Forces, which are least fit for a Defensive War, where the Actions are in the Assailants choice. It was our Disorders only, that lost France; and (by the Power of God) it is the good Peace which we now enjoy, that will recover it. God hath hitherto blessed my Sword. I have in this time that I have Reigned, weeded out my bad Subjects, and tryed my good. My People and I know one another; which breeds Confidence. And if there should be any bad Blood left in the Kingdom, an Honourable foreign War will vent it, or purify it. In this great Business, let me have your advice, and Aid. If any of you were to make his Son Knight, you might have aid of your Tenants by Law. This concerns the Knighthood and Spurs of the Kingdom, whereof I am Father; and bound not only to seek to maintain it, but to advance it. But for Matter of Treasure, let it not be taken from the Poorest Sort; but from those, to whom the Benefit of the War may redound. France is no Wilderness: and I, that profess Good Husbandry, hope to make the War (after the beginnings) to pay it self. Go together God's Name in and lose no time; for I have called this Parliament wholly for this Cause.

The King Pretends War only to get Money. Thus spake the King; But for all this, though he shewed great Forwardness for a War, not only to his Parliament and Court, but to his Privy-Council likewise, (except the two Bishops and a few more) yet nevertheless in his Secret Intentions, he had no Purpose to go through with any War, upon France. But the Truth was, that he did but traffick with that War, to make his Return in Money. He knew well, that France was now entire, and at Unity with it self, and never so mighty many Years before. He saw by the taste that he had of his Forces sent into Brittain, that the French knew well enough how to make War with the English; by not putting things to the Hazard of a Battel, but wearying them by long Sieges of Towns, and strong Fortified Encampings. James the III. of Scotland, (his true Friend, and Confederate) gone; and James the IV (that had succeeded) wholly at the Devotion of France, and ill affected towards him. As for the Conjunctions of Ferdinando of Spain, and Maximilian; he could make no Foundation upon them. For the one 1490. had Power, and not Will; and the other hath Will, and not Power. Besides that, Ferdinando had but newly taken Breath, from the War with the Moors; and Merchanded at this time with France, for the restoring of the Counties of Ruffington and Perpignian, oppignorated to the French. Neither was he out of Fear of the Discontents, an ill Blood within the Realm; which having used always to repress and appease in Person, he was loth they should find him at a distance beyond Sea, and engaged in War. Finding therefore the Inconveniences and Difficulties in the prosecution of a War, he cast with himself how to compass two things. The one, how by the Declaration and Inchoation of a War, to make his Profit. The other, how to come off from the War, with saving of his Honour. For Profit, it was to be made two ways; upon his Subjects for the War, and upon his Enemies for the Peace; like a good Merchant, that maketh his Gain, both upon the Commodities exported, and imported back again. For the Point of Honour, wherein he might suffer, for giving over the War; he considered well, that as he could not trust upon the aids of Ferdinando and Maximilian for Supports of War: so the Impuissance of the one, and the double proceeding of the other, lay fair for him for Occasions to accept of Peace. These things he did wisely fore-see, and did as artificially conduct, whereby all things fell into his Lap, as he desired.

For as for the Parliament, it presently took Fire, being affectionate (of old) to the War of France; and desirous a-fresh to repair the Dishonour, they thought the King sustained by the Loss of Brittain. Therefore they advised the King (with great Alacrity) to undertake the War of France. And although the Parliament consisted of the First and second Nobility (together with Principal Citizens and Townsmen) yet worthily and justly respecting more the People (whose Deputies they were) than their own private Persons, and finding by the Lord Chancellor's Speech the King's Inclination that way; they consented that Commissioners should go forth, for the gathering and levying of a Benevolence, from the more able sort. This Tax (called Benevolence) was devised by Edward the Fourth for which he granted the King sustained much Envy. It was abolished by Richard the Third by Act of Parliament, to ingratiate himself with the People; and it was now revived by the King, but with consent of Parliament, for so it was not in the time of King Edward the Fourth. But by this way he raised exceeding great Sums. Inasmuch as the City of London (in those Days) contributed nine thousand Pounds and better; and that chiefly levied upon the Wealthier sort. There is a Tradition of a Dilemma, that Bishop Morton the Chancellor used to raise up the Benevolence to higher Rates; and some called it his Fork, and some his Crutch. For he had couch'd an Article in the Instructions to the Commissioners, who were to levy the Benevolence; That if they met with any that were sparing, they should tell them, That they must needs have, because they laid up; and if they were spenders, they must needs have, because it was seen in their Port, and manner of living. So neither kind came amiss.

This Parliament was merely a Parliament of War; for it was in substance, but a Declaration of War against France and Scotland, with some Statutes conducing thereunto; as the severe punishing of Mort-pays, and keeping back of Souldiers Wages and Captains. The like Severity for the Departure of Souldiers without Licence; Strengthening without Fines.

Strengthening of the Common-Law in favour of Protections, for those that were in the King's Service; And the setting the Gate open and wide, for Men to sell or mortgage their Lands without Fines for Alienation, to furnish themselves with Money for the War; And lastly, the voiding of all Scottish-men out of England. There was also a Statute, for the dispersing of the Standard of the Exchequer, throughout England; thereby to size Weights and Measures; and two or three more of less Importance.

After the Parliament was broken up (which lasted not long) the King went on with his Preparations for the War of France; yet neglected not in the mean time the Affairs of Maximilian, for the quieting of Flanders, and restoring him to his Authority amongst his Subjects. For at that time, the Lord of Ravenstein being not only a Subject Rebell'd, but a Servant revolted (and so much the more Malicious and Violent, by the Aid of Bruges and Gaunt) had taken the Town and both the Castles of Sluice; as we said before.

And having (by the Commodity of the Haven) gotten together certain Ships and Barks, fell to a kind of Pyratrical Trade; robbing and spoiling, and taking Prisoners the Ships and Vessels of all Nations, that passed alongst that Coast, towards the Mart of Antwerp, or into any part of Brabant, Zeland, or Friesland; being ever well Victualled from Picardie, besides the Commodity of Victuals from Sluice, and the Country adjacent, and the Avails of his own Prizes. The French assisted him still under-hand; and he likewise (as all Men do, that have been of both sides) thought himself not safe, except he depended upon a third Person.

There was a small Town some two Miles from Bruges, towards the Sea, called Dam; which was a Fort and Approach to Bruges, and had a Relation also to Sluice. This Town the King of the Romans had attempted often, (not for any worth of the Town in it self, but because it might choak Bruges, and cut it off from the Sea) and ever fail'd. But therewith the Duke of Saxony came down into Flanders, taking upon him the Person of an Umpire, to compose things between Maximilian and his Subjects; but being (indeed) fast and assured to Maximilian. Upon this Pretext of Neutrality and Treaty, he repaired to Bruges; desiring of the States of Bruges, to enter peaceably into their Town, with a Retinue of some Number of Men of Arms, fit for his Estate; being somewhat the more (as he said) the better to guard him in a Country, that was up in Arms: and bearing them in hand, that he was to communicate with them of divers Matters of great Importance, for their Good. Which having obtained of them, he sent his Carriages and Harbingers before him, to provide his Lodging. So that his Men of War entred the City in good Array, but in peaceable manner, and he followed. They that went before, enquired still for Inns and Lodgings, as if they would have rested there all Night, and so went on, till they came to the Gate, that leadeth directly towards Dam; and they of Bruges only gazed upon them and gave them Passage. The Captains and Inhabitants of Dam also suspected no Harm, from any that passed through Bruges; and discovering Forces a far off, supposed they had been some Succours, that were come from their Friends, knowing some dangers, towards them. And so perceiving nothing but well, till it was too late, suffered them to enter their Town. By which kind of Sleight rather than Stratagem, the Town of Dam was taken and the Town of Bruges shrewdly blockt up, whereby they took great discouragement.

The Duke of Saxony having won the Town of Dam, sent immediately to the King to let him know that it was Sluice chiefly, and the Lord Ravenstein, that kept the Rebellion of Flanders in life; And that if it pleased the King to besiege it by Sea, he also would besiege it by Land, and so cut out the Core of those Wars.

The King willing to uphold the Authority of Maximilian (the better to hold France in aw) and being likewise sued unto by his Merchants, for that the Seas were much infested by the Barks of the Lord Ravenstein; sent straightways Sir Edward Poynings a valiant Man, and of good Service, with twelve Ships, well furnished with Souldiers and Artillery, to clear the Seas, and to besiege Sluice on that part. The Englishmen did not only coop up the Lord Ravenstein, that he stirred not, and likewise hold in strait Siege the Maritim part of the Town; but also assail'd one of the Castles, and renewed the Assault so for twenty days space (issuing still out of their Ships at the Ebb) as they made great Slaughter of them of the Castle; who continually fought with them to repulse them, though of the English part also were slain a Brother of the Earl of Oxford's and some fifty more.

But the Siege still continuing more and more strait, and both the Castles (which were the principal strength of the Town) being distressed, the one by the Duke of Saxony, and the other by the English; and a Bridge of Boats, which the Lord Ravenstein had made between both Castles, whereby Succours and Relief might pass from the one to the other, being on a Night set on fire by the English, he despairing to hold the Town, yielded (at the last) the Castles to the English, and the Town to the Duke of Saxony, by Composition. Which done, the Duke of Saxony and Sir Edward Poynings treated with them of Bruges, to submit themselves to Maximilian their Lord; which after some time they did, paying (in some good part) the Charge of the War, whereby the Almains and foreign Succours were dismissed. The example of Bruges other of the Revolted Towns followed; so that Maximilian grew to be out of Danger, but (as his manner was to handle matters) never out of Necessity. And Sir Edward Poynings (after he had continued at Sluice some good while, till all things were settled) returned unto the King, being then before Bulloigne.

Somewhat about this time came Letters from Ferdinando, and Isabella, King and Queen of Spain; signifying the final Conquest of Granada from the Moors; which Action in it self so worthy, King Ferdinando (whose manner was never to lose any Vertue for the shewing) had expressed and displayed in his Letters at large, with all the particularities, and religious Punctoes and Ceremonies, that were observed in the Reception of that City and Kingdom: Shewing amongst other things, that the King would not by any means in Person enter the City, until he had first aloof seen the Cross set up upon the greater Tower of Granada, whereby it became Christian Ground: That likewise before he would enter, he did Homage to God above, pronouncing by an Herald from the Height of that Tower, that he did acknowledge to have recovered that Kingdom, by the help of God Almighty and the Glorious Virgin, and the Vertuous Apostle Saint James, and the Holy Father Innocent the Eight, together with the Aids and Services of his Prelates, Nobles, and Commons: That yet he stirred not from his Camp, till he had seen a

These things were in the Letters, with many more Ceremonies of a kind of Holy Ostentation.

to the Sp-nish King.

The King ever willing to put himself into the Consort or Quire of all religious Actions, and naturally affecting much the King of Spain, (as far as one King can affect another) partly for his Vertues, and partly for a Counterpoise to France; upon the receipt of these Letters, sent all his Nobles and Prelates, that were about the Court, together with the Mayor and Aldermen of London, in great Solemnity to the Church of Pauls; there to Hear a Declaration from the Lord Chancellor, now Cardinal. When they were Assembled *, the Cardinal (standing upon the uppermost Step, or half-pace before the Quire; and all the Nobles, Prelates, and Governours of the City at the foot of the Stairs) made a Speech to them; letting them know, that they were Assembled in that Consecrate Place to sing unto God a New-Song: 'For that (said he) 'these many Years the Christians have 'not gained new Ground or Territory upon the 'Infidels, nor enlarged and set further the Bounds 'of the Christian World: But this is now done 'by the Prowess and Devotion of Ferdinando 'and Isabella, Kings of Spain; who have (to 'their Immortal Honour) recover'd the great 'and rich Kingdom of Granada, and the popu- 'lous and mighty City of the same Name, from 'the Moors, having been in Possession thereof by 'the space of Seven hundred Years, and more. 'For which, this Assembly and all Christians 'are to render Laud and Thanks unto God, and 'to celebrate this noble Act of the King of 'Spain; who in this is not only Victorious, but 'Apostolical, in the gaining of new Provinces to 'the Christian Faith. And the rather, for that 'this Victory and Conquest is obtain'd, without 'much Effusion of Blood. Whereby it is to be 'hoped, that there shall be gained, not only 'new Territory, but infinite Souls to the Church 'of Christ; whom the Almighty (as it seems) 'would have live to be converted. Herewithal he did relate some of the most Memorable Particulars of the War and Victory. And after his Speech ended, the whole Assembly went Solemnly in Procession, and Te Deum was sung.

Immediately after the Solemnity, the King kept his May-Day at his Palace of Sheine, now Richmond: Where to warm the Blood of his Nobility and Gallants, against the War, he kept great Triumphs of Jousting and Tourney, during all that Month. In which space it so fell out, that Sir James Parker and Hugh Vaughan, (one of the King's Gentlemen-Ushers) having had a Controversy touching certain Arms, that the King at Arms had given Vaughan, were appointed to run some Courses one against another: And by accident of a faulty Helmet, that Parker had on, he was stricken into the Mouth at the first Course, so that his Tongue was born unto the hinder-part of his Head, in such sort that he died presently upon the place. Which because of the Controversy Precedent and the Death that follow'd, was accounted amongst the Vulgar, as a Combate or Tryal of Right. The King, towards the end of this Summer, having put his Forces, wherewith he meant to invade France, in readiness, (but so as they were not yet met or mustered together) sent Urfwick

(now made his Almoner) and Sir John Risley to Maximilian; to let him know, that he was in Arms, ready to pass the Seas into France, and did but expect to hear from him, when and where he did appoint to joyn with him, according to his Promise made unto him by Counte-balt, his Ambassador.

The English Ambassadors, having repaired to Maximilian, did find his Power and Promise at a very great distance; he being utterly unprovided of Men, Money, and Arms for any such Enterprize. For Maximilian having neither Wing to fly on (for that his Patrimony of Austria was not in his Hands, his Father being then living: And on the other side, his Matrimonial Territories of Flanders being partly in Dower to his Mother-in-Law, and partly not serviceable, in respect of the late Rebellions) was thereby destitute of Means to enter into War. The Ambassadors saw this well, but wisely thought fit to advertise the King thereof, rather than to return themselves till the King's further Pleasure were known: The rather, for that Maximilian himself spake as great as ever he did before, and entertain'd them with dilatory Answers; so as the formal part of their Ambassage might well warrant and require their further stay. The King hereupon (who doubted as much before, and saw thro' his Business from the beginning) wrote back to the Ambassadors, commending their Discretion in not returning, and willing them to keep the State wherein they found Maximilian, as a Secret, till they heard further from him: And mean while went on with his Voyage Royal for France, suppressing for a time this Advertisement touching Maximilian's Poverty and Disability.

By this time was drawn together a great and Puissant Army into the City of London. In which were, Thomas Marquess Dorset, Thomas Earl of Arundel, Thomas Earl of Derby, George Earl of Shrewsbury, Edmond Earl of Suffolk, Edward Earl of Devonshire, George Earl of Kent, the Earl of Essex, Thomas Earl of Ormond, with a great number of Barons, Knights, and principal Gentlemen; and amongst them Richard Thomas, much noted for the brave Troops that he brought out of Wales; The Army rising in the whole to the number of Five and twenty Thousand Foot, and Sixteen Hundred Horse. Over which, the King (constant in his accustom'd Trust and Imployment) made Jasper Duke of Bedford, and John Earl of Oxford, Generals under his own Person. The 9th of September, in the Eighth Year of his Reign, he departed from Greenwich towards the Sea; all Men wondring that he took that Season (being so near Winter) to begin the War; and some thereupon gathering it was a Sign that the War would not be long. Nevertheless, the King gave out the contrary, thus: That he intended not to make a Summer Business of it, but a resolute War (without term prefixed) until he recover'd France; it skilled not much when he began it: Especially, having Calice at his back; where he might Winter, if the reason of the War so required. The 6th of October, he Im-

Land at Calice: which was the Rendezvous where all his Forces were assign'd to meet. But in this his Journey towards the Sea side (wherein, for the Cause that we shall now speak of, he hover'd so much the longer) he had receiv'd Letters from the Lord Cordes: who, the hotter he was against the English in time of War, had the more credit in a Negotiation of Peace; and besides was held a Man open, and of good Faith. In which Letters there was made an Overture

1491. ture of Peace from the French King, with such Conditions, as were somewhat to the King's Taste: but this was carried at the first with wonderful Secrecy. The King was no sooner come to Calice, but the Calm Winds of Peace began to blow. For, first, the English Ambassadors return'd out of Flanders from Maximilian; and certified the King, that he was not to hope for any Aid from Maximilian, for that he was altogether improvident: His Will was good; but he lacked Money. And this was made known and spread through the Army. And altho' the English were therewithal nothing dismay'd; and that it be the manner of Soldiers, upon bad News to Speak the more Bravely; yet nevertheless it was a kind of Preparative to a Peace. Instantly in the neck of this (as the King had laid it) came News that Ferdinando and Isabella, Kings of Spain, had concluded a Peace with King Charles; and that Charles had restor'd unto them the Counties of Russignon and Perpignian, which formerly were mortgaged by John King of Arragon (Ferdinando's Father) unto France, for Three hundred Thousand Crowns: which Debt was also upon this Peace, by Charles clearly released. This came also handfomly to put on the Peace: both because so Potent a Confederate was fallen off, and because it was a fair Example of a Peace bought; so as the King should not be the sole Merchant in this Peace. Upon these Airs of Peace, the King was content, that the Bishop of Exeter and the Lord Daubigny (Governour of Calice) should give a Meeting unto the Lord Cordes, for the Treaty of a Peace. But himself nevertheless, and his Army, the 15th of October removed from Calice, and in four days March sat him down before Bulloigne.

K. Henry besieges Bulloigne.

During this Siege of Bulloigne (which continued near a Month) there passed no memorable Accident of War; only Sir John Savage, a valiant Captain was Slain, riding about the Walls of the Town to take a View. The Town was both well fortify'd and well mann'd; yet it was distressed, and ready for an Assault. Which if it had been given (as was thought) would have cost much Blood; but yet the Town would have been carried in the End. Mean while, a Peace was concluded by the Commissioners, to continue for both the Kings Lives. Where there was no Article of Importance; being in effect rather a Bargain than a Treaty. For, all things remained as they were; save that there should be paid to the King Seven hundred Forty five Thousand Ducats in Present, for his Charges in that Journey; and Five and twenty Thousand Crowns yearly, for his Charges sustained in the Aids of the Britons. For which Annual, tho' he had Maximilian Bound before for those Charges; yet he counted the Alteration of the Hand, as much as the Principal Debt. And besides, it was left somewhat indefinitely, when it should Determine or Expire: Which made the English esteem it as a Tribute carried under fair Terms. And the truth is, it was Paid both to the King, and to his Son King Henry VIII. longer than it could continue upon any Computation of Charges. There were also assign'd by the French King, unto all the King's principal Counsellors great Pensions, besides rich Gifts for the present. Which whether the King did permit to save his own Purse from Rewards, or to communicate the Envy of a Business that was displeasing to his People, was diversly interpreted. For certainly, the King had no great fancy to own this Peace. And therefore, a little before it was concluded, he had under-hand procur'd some of his best Captains, and Men of War, to advise him to a Peace under their Hands, in an earnest manner, in the Nature of a Supplication. But the truth is, this Peace was welcom to both Kings. To Charles, for that it assur'd unto him the Possession of Brittain, and freed the Enterprize of Naples. To Henry, for that it fill'd his Coffers; and that he foresaw at that time a Storm of inward Troubles coming upon him; which presently after brake forth. But it gave no less Discontent to the Nobility, and principal Persons of the Army; who had many of them sold or engaged their Estates upon the Hopes of the War. They stuck not to say, That the King cared not to plume his Nobility and People, to feather himself. And some made themselves merry with that the King had said in Parliament: That after the War was once begun, he doubted not but to make it pay it self; saying he had kept Promise.

Having risen from Bulloigne, he went to Calice, where he stay'd some time. From whence also he wrote Letters, * (which was a Courtesy that he sometimes us'd) to the Mayor of London, and Aldermen his Brethren; half bragging what great Sums he had obtain'd for the Peace; The King knowing well, that full Coffers of the King is ever good News to London. And better News it would have been, if their Benevolence had been but a Loan. And upon the 17th of December following, he return'd to Westminster, where he kept his Christmas.

Soon after the King's Return, he sent the Order of the Garter, || to Alphonso Duke of Calabria, eldest Son to Ferdinando King of Naples; an Honour sought by that Prince, to hold him up in the Eyes of the Italians: Who, expecting the Arms of Charles, made great Account of the Amity of England for a Bridle to France. It was received by Alphonso with all the Ceremony and Pomp that could be devised; as things use to be carried, that are intended for Opinion. It was sent by Urswick; upon whom the King bestow'd this Ambassage, to help him, after many dry Employments.

At this time the King began again to be haunted with Sprites, by the Magick and curious Arts of the Lady Margaret: Who rais'd up the Ghost of Richard Duke of York, second Son to King Edward IV. to walk and vex the King. This was a finer Counterfeit Stone than Lambert Symnell, better done, and worn upon greater Hands; being graced after with the wearing of a King of France, and a King of Scotland, not of a Dutcheffs of Burgundy only. And for Simmell, there was not much in him, more than that he was a handsom Boy, and did not shame his Robes. But this Youth (of whom we are now to speak) was such a Mercurial, as the like hath seldom been known, and could make his own Part if at any time he chanc'd to be out. Wherefore, this being one of the strangest Examples of a Personation that ever was in Elder or Later Times; it deserveth to be discovered, and related at the full: Altho' the King's manner of shewing things, by Pieces and by Dark Lights, hath so muffled it, that it hath left it almost as a Mystery to this Day.

The Lady Margaret (whom the King's Friends call'd Juno, because she was to him as Juno was to Aeneas, stirring both Heaven and Hell to do him Mischief) for a Foundation of her particular Practices against him, did continually, by all means possible, nourish, maintain, and divulge the flying Opinion, That Richard Duke of York (second Son to Edward IV.) was not murder'd in the Tower (as was given out) but saved

1492. ved alive : For that those who were employ'd in that barbarous Fact, having destroy'd the elder Brother, were stricken with Remorse and Compassion towards the younger, and set him privily at liberty to seek his Fortune. This Lure she cast abroad, thinking that this Fame and Belief (together with the fresh Example of Lambert Simnell) would draw at one time or other some Birds to strike upon it. She used likewise a further Diligence, not committing all to Chance. For, she had some secret Espials (like to the Turks Commissioners for Children of Tribute) to look abroad for handfom and graceful Youths, to make Plantagenets, and Dukes of York. At the last she did light on one, in whom all things met, as one would wish, to serve her turn, for a Counterfeit of Richard Duke of York.

This was Perkin Warbeck, whose Adventures we shall now describe. For, First, the Years agreed well. Secondly, He was a Youth of fine Favour and Shape; But more than that, he had such a crafty and bewitching Fashion, both to move Pity and to induce Belief, as was like a kind of Fascination and Inchantment to those that saw him, or heard him. Thirdly, he had been from his Childhood such a Wanderer, or (as the King called him) such a Land-loper, as it was extreme hard to hunt out his Nest and Parents. Neither again could any Man, by Company or Converse with him, be able to say or detect well what he was; he did so flit from place to place. Lastly, There was a Circumstance (which is mentioned by one that wrote in the same time) that is very likely to have made somewhat to the Matter; which is, That King Edward IV. was his Godfather. Which, as it is somewhat suspicious, for a wanton Prince to become Gossip in so mean a House; and might make a Man think that he might indeed have in him some base Blood of the House of York: so at the least (tho' that were not) it might give the occasion to the Boy, in being call'd King Edward's Godson, or perhaps in sport, King Edward's Son, to entertain such Thoughts into his Head. For, Tutor he had none (for ought that appears) as Lambert Simnell had, until he came unto the Lady Margaret, who instructed him.

Thus therefore it came to pass: There was a Townsman of Tournay, that had born Office in that Town, whose Name was (a) John Osbeck, a Convert-Jew, married to Catherine de Faro; whose Business drew him to live for a time with his Wife at London, in King Edward IV.'s days. During which time he had a Son by her: and being known in Court, the King either out of a religious Nobleness, because he was a Convert, or upon some private Acquaintance, did him the Honour as to be Godfather to his Child, and named him Peter. But afterwards proving a Dainty and Effeminate Youth, he was commonly call'd by the Diminutive of his Name, Peter-Kin, or Perkin. For, as for the Name of Warbeck, it was given him when they did but guess at it, before Examinations had been taken. But yet he had been so much talk'd on by that Name, as it stuck by him after his true Name of Osbeck was known. While he was a young Child, his Parents return'd with him to Tournay. Then was he placed in a House of a Kinsman of his, call'd John Stenbeck at Antwerp: and so roved up and down between Antwerp and Tournay, and other Towns of Flanders, for a good time; living much in English Company, and having the English Tongue perfect. In which time being grown a comely Youth, he was brought by some of the Espials of the Lady Margaret unto her Presence. Who viewing him well, and seeing that he had a Face and Personage, that would bear a Noble Fortune: And finding him otherwise of a fine Spirit and winning Behaviour, thought she had now found a curious Piece of Marble, to carve out an Image of a Duke of York. She kept him by her a great while; but with extreme Secrecy. The while, she instructed him, by many Cabinet-Conferences. First, In Princely Behaviour and Gesture; teaching him how he should keep State, and yet with a modest Sense of his Misfortunes. Then she inform'd him of all the Circumstances and Particulars that concerned the Person of Richard Duke of York, which he was to act: Describing unto him the Personages, Lineaments, and Features of the King and Queen his pretended Parents; and of his Brother, and Sisters, and divers others that were nearest him in his Childhood; together with all Passages, some secret some common, that were fit for a Child's Memory, until the Death of King Edward. Then she added the Particulars of the Time, from the King's Death, until he and his Brother were committed to the Tower, as well during the time he was Abroad, as while he was in Sanctuary. As for the times while he was in the Tower, and the manner of his Brother's Death, and his own Escape; she knew they were things that a very few could controul. And therefore she taught him only to tell a smooth and likely Tale of those Matters; warning him not to vary from it. It was agreed likewise between them, what Account he should give of his Peregrination abroad; intermixing many things which were true, and such as they knew others could testify, for the Credit of the rest: But still making them hang together, with the Part he was to play. She taught him likewise how to avoid sundry captious and tempting Questions, which were like to be asked of him. But, in this she found him of himself so nimble and shifting, as she trusted much to his own Wit and Readiness; and therefore labour'd the less in it. Lastly, she raised his Thoughts with some present Rewards, and further Promises; setting before him chiefly the Glory and Fortune of a Crown, if things went well; and a sure Refuge to her Court, if the worst should fall. After such time as she thought he was perfect in his Lesson, she began to cast with her self from what Coast this Blazing-Star should first appear, and at what time it must be upon the Horizon of Ireland; for there had the like Meteor strong Influence before: The time of the Apparition to be, when the King should be engaged into a War with France. But well she knew, that whatsoever should come from her, would be held suspected. And therefore, if he should go out of Flanders immediately into Ireland, she might be thought to have some hand in it. And besides, the time was not yet ripe; for that the two Kings were then upon Terms of Peace. Therefore she wheel'd about; and to put all Suspicion afar off, and loth to keep him any longer by her (for that she knew Secrets are not long liv'd) she sent him unknown into Portugal, with the Lady Brampton, (b) an English Lady, that Embark'd for Portugal at that time;

(a) His true Name was Peter Osbeck; he was not unlike Richard Duke of York, both in Body and Countenance; he was Born at Tournay in Flanders. Whose Father, John Osbeck, was Controulor of that City, and his Mother Catherine de Faro, who could speak English. Sir J. Ware, Ann. Hen. VII. Cap. 6. (b) Sir Richard Brampton's Wife.

1492. with some Privado of her own, to have an Eye upon him: and there he was to remain, and to expect her further Directions. In the mean time, she omitted not to prepare things for his better Welcom, and Accepting, not only in the Kingdom of Ireland, but in the Court of France. He continued in Portugal about a Year; and by that time, the King of England called his Parliament (as hath been said) and declared open War against France. Now did the Sign reign, and the Constellation was come, under which Perkin would appear. And therefore he was straight sent unto by the Dutchess to go for Ireland, according to the first Designment. In Ireland he did Arrive at the Town of Cork. When he was come thither, his own Tale was (when he made his Confession afterwards) That the Irishmen, finding him in some good Clothes, came flocking about him, and bare him down, that he was the Duke of Clarence, that had been there before: And after, that he was Richard the III's base Son: And lastly, that he was Richard Duke of York, second Son to Edward IV: But that he (for his part) renounced all these things, and offer'd to Swear upon the Holy Evangelists, that he was no such Man; till at last they forced it upon him and bad him fear nothing, and so forth. But the truth is, that immediately upon his coming into Ireland, he took upon him the said Person of the Duke of York, and drew unto him Complices, and Partakers, by all the Means he could devise: Infomuch, as he wrote his Letters unto the Earls of Desmond and Kildare, to come in to his Aid, and be of his Party; the Originals of which Letters are yet extant.

Frion,
K. Henry's Secretary for the French Tongue joyns with Perkin.

The Fr.
King favours Perkin.

Somewhat before this time, the Dutchess had gained unto her, a near Servant of King Henry's own, one Stephen Frion, his Secretary for the French Tongue; an Active Man, but turbulent and discontented. This Frion had fled over to Charles the French King, and put himself into his Service, at such time as he began to be in open Enmity with the King. Now King Charles, when he understood of the Person and Attempts of Perkin (ready of himself to embrace all Advantages against the King of England; instigated by Frion, and formerly prepared by the Lady Margaret) forthwith dispatch'd one Lucas, and this Frion, in the Nature of Ambassadors to Perkin; to advertise him of the King's good Inclination to him, and that he was resolv'd to Aid him to recover his Right against King Henry, an Usurper of England, and an Enemy of France; and wish'd him to come over unto him at Paris. Perkin thought himself in Heaven now that he was invited by so great a King, in so honourable a manner: and imparting unto his Friends in Ireland for their Incouragement, how Fortune called him, and what great hopes he had, sail'd presently into France. When he was come to the Court of France, the King receiv'd him with great Honour; saluted, and stiled him by the Name of the Duke of York; lodged him, and accommodated him in great State: And the better to give him the Representation and the Countenance of a Prince, assign'd him a Guard for his Person, whereof the Lord Congreall was Captain. The Courtiers likewise (tho' it be ill mocking with the French) applied themselves to their King's Bent, seeing there was Reason of State for it. At the same time there repair'd unto Perkin divers Englishmen of Quality; Sir George Nevile, Sir John Taylor, and about One hundred more; and amongst the rest, this Stephen Frion, of whom we spake; who follow'd his Fortune both then and for a long time after, and was indeed his Principal Councillor, and Instrument in all his Proceedings. But all this, on the French King's part, was but a Trick; the better to bow King Henry to Peace. And therefore upon the first Grain of Incense that was sacrificed upon the Altar of Peace at Bulloigne, Perkin was smok'd away. Yet would not the French King deliver him up to King Henry (as he was labour'd to do) for his Honour's sake, but warn'd him away and dismissed him. And Perkin on his part was ready to be gone, doubting he might be caught up under-hand. He therefore took his way into Flanders, unto the Dutchess of Burgundy; pretending, that having been variously toss'd by Fortune, he directed his Course thither, as to a safe Harbour: No ways taking knowledge that he had ever been there before, but as if that had been his first Address. The Dutchess, on the other part, made it as new and strange to see him: pretending (at the first) that she was taught and made wise by the Example of Lambert Simnell, how she did admit of any Counterfeit Stuff; tho' even in that (she said) she was not fully satisfied. She pretended at the first (and that was ever in the presence of others) to pose him and sift him, thereby to try whether he were indeed the very Duke of York, or no. But seeming to receive full Satisfaction by his Answers, she then feign'd her self to be transported with a kind of Astonishment, mixt of Joy and Wonder, at his miraculous Deliverance; receiving him, as if he were risen from Death to Life: and inferring, that God, who had in such wonderful manner preserv'd him from Death, did likewise reserve him for some great and prosperous Fortune. As for his Dismission out of France, they interpreted it not, as if he were detected or neglected for a Counterfeit Deceiver; but contrariwise, that it did shew manifestly unto the World, that he was some great Matter; for that it was his abandoning, that (in effect) made the Peace: being no more but the Sacrificing of a poor distressed Prince unto the Utility and Ambition of two Mighty Monarchs. Neither was Perkin for his part wanting to himself, either in gracious and Princely Behaviour, or in ready and apposite Answers, or in contenting and caressing those that did apply themselves unto him, or in pretty Scorn and Disdain to those that seem'd to doubt of him; but in all things did notably acquit himself: Infomuch as it was generally believed (as well amongst great Persons, as amongst the Vulgar) that he was indeed Duke Richard. Nay, himself, with long and continual counterfeiting, and with oft telling a Lye, was turn'd by habit almost into the thing he seem'd to be; and from a Lye to a Believer. The Dutchess therefore (as in a Case out of doubt) did him all Princely Honour, calling him always by the Name of her Nephew, and giving him the Delicate Title of The White Rose of England; and appointed him a Guard of Thirty Persons, Halberdiers, clad in a Party-colour'd Livery of Murrey and Blew, to Attend his Person. Her Court likewise and generally the Dutch and Strangers in their usage towards him, expressed no less Respect.

The News hereof came blazing and thundering over into England, that the Duke of York was sure alive. As for the Name of Perkin Warbeck, it was not at that time come to light, but all the News ran upon the Duke of York; that he had been entertain'd in Ireland, bought and sold in France, and was now plainly avowed, and in great Honour in Flanders. These Fames took hold of divers; In some upon Discontent, in some upon Ambition, in some upon Levity and Desire of Change, and in some few upon Conscience and Belief, but in most upon Simplicity; and 1493. and in divers out of Dependance upon some of the better sort, who did in secret favour and nourish these Bruits. And it was not long, ere these Rumours of Novelty had begotten others of Scandal and Murmur against the King and his Government; taxing him for a great Taxer of his People, and Discountenancer of his Nobility. The Loss of Brittain, and the Peace with France were not forgotten. But chiefly they fell upon the wrong that he did his Queen, in that he did not Reign in her Right. Wherefore they said, that God had now brought to light a Masculine-Branch of the House of York, that would not be at his Curtesy, howsoever he did deprecate his poor Lady. And yet (as it fareth in things which are currant with the Multitude, and which they affect) these Fables grew so general, as the Authors were lost in the Generality of Speakers. They being like running Weeds, that have no certain Root; or like Footings up and down, impossible to be traced. But after a while, these ill Humours drew to an Head, and settled secretly in some eminent Persons; which were Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlain of the King's Household, the Lord Fitzwater, Sir Simon Mountfort, Sir Thomas Thwaites. These entered into a secret Conspiracy to favour Duke Richard's Title. Nevertheless none engaged their Fortunes in this Business openly, but two; Sir Robert Clifford and Master William Barley, who sail'd over into Flanders, sent indeed from the Party of the Conspirators here, to understand the Truth of those things that passed there, and not without some help of Moneys from hence; Provisionally to be deliver'd, if they found and were satisfied that there was Truth in these Pretences. The Person of Sir Robert Clifford (being a Gentleman of Fame and Family) was extremely Welcome to the Lady Margaret. Who after she had Conference with him, brought him to the sight of Perkin, with whom he had often Speech and Discourse. So that in the end won either by the Dutche's to affect, or by Perkin to believe, he wrote back into England, that he knew the Person of Richard Duke of York, as well as he knew his own; and that this Young Man was undoubtedly he. By this means all things grew prepared to Revolt and Sedition here, and the Conspiracy came to a Correspondence between Flanders and England.

The King on his part was not asleep; but to arm or levy Forces yet, he thought would but shew Fear, and do this Idol too much Worship. Nevertheless the Ports he did shut up, or at least kept a Watch on them, that none should pass to or fro that was suspected. But for the rest, he chose to work by Countermine. His purposes were two; The one, to lay open the Abuse; the other, to break the Knot of the Conspirators. To detect the Abuse, there were but two ways: The first, to make it manifest to the World that the Duke of York was indeed murder'd: The other to prove, that were he Dead or Alive, yet Perkin was a Counterfeit. For the first, thus it stood. There were but four Persons that could speak upon Knowledge to the Murder of the Duke of York: Sir James Tirrel (the employ'd-man from King Richard) John Dighton, and Miles Forrest, his Servants (the two Butchers or Tormentors) and the Priest of the Tower, that buried them. Of which four, Miles Forrest, and the Priest were dead, and there remain'd alive only Sir James Tirrel and John Dighton. These two the King caused to be committed to the Tower, and examined touching the manner of the Death of the two innocent Princes. They agreed both in a Tale, (as the King gave out) to this effect:

That King Richard having directed his Warrant 1493. for the putting of them to Death to Brackenbury the Lieutenant of the Tower, was by him refused. Whereupon the King directed his Warrant to Sir James Tirrel, to receive the Keys of the Tower from the Lieutenant (for the space of a Night) for the King's special Service. That Sir James Tirrel accordingly repair'd to the Tower by Night, attended by his two Servants afore-named, whom he had chosen for that purpose. That himself stood at the Stair-foot, and sent these two Villains to execute the Murther. That they smother'd them in their Bed; and that done, call'd up their Master to see their naked Bodies, which they had laid forth. That they were buried under the Stairs, and some Stones cast upon them. That when the Report was made to King Richard, that his Will was done, he gave Sir James Tirrel great Thanks, but took Exception to the Place of their Burial, being too base for them that were Kings Children. Whereupon another Night by the King's Warrant renew'd, their Bodies were remov'd by the Priest of the Tower, and buried by him in some Place, which (by means of the Priest's Death soon after) could not be known. Thus much was then deliver'd Abroad, to be the Effect of those Examinations. But the King nevertheless made no use of them in any of his Declarations; whereby (as it seems) those Examinations left the Business somewhat perplex'd. And as for Sir James Tirrel, he was soon after Beheaded in the Tower-Yard, for other Matters of Treason*. But John Dighton (who it seemeth spake best for the King) was forthwith set at Liberty, and was the principal Means of divulging this Tradition. Therefore this kind of Proof being left so naked, the King used the more Diligence in the latter, for the tracing of Perkin. To this purpose, he sent abroad into several Parts, and especially into Flanders, divers secret and nimble Scouts and Spies; some feigning themselves to fly over unto Perkin, and to adhere unto him; and some under other Pretences, to learn, search, and discover all the Circumstances and Particulars of Perkin's Parents, Birth, Person, Travels up and down; and in brief, to have a Journal (as it were) of his Life and Doings. He furnish'd these his employed-men liberally with Money, to draw on and reward Intelligences: giving them also in Charge, to advertise continually what they found, and nevertheless still to go on. And ever as one Advertisement and Discovery call'd up another, he employ'd other new Men, where the Business did require it. Others he employ'd in a more special Nature and Trust, to be his Pioneers in the main Counter-mine. These were directed to insinuate themselves into the Familiarity and Confidence of the principal Persons of the Party in Flanders, and so to learn what Associates they had, and Correspondents, either here in England, or Abroad; and how far every one engaged, and what new ones they meant afterwards to try, or board. And as this for the Persons; so for the Actions themselves, to discover to the Bottom (as they could) the utmost of Perkins and the Conspirators their Intentions, Hopes, and Practices. These latter Best-trust-Spies had some of them further Instructions, to practise and draw off the best Friends and Servants of Perkin, by making Remonstrance to them, how weakly his Enterprize and Hopes were built, and with how prudent and potent a King they had to deal; and to reconcile them to the King, with Promise of Pardon, and good Conditions of Reward. And (above the rest) to assail, sap, and work into the Constancy of Sir

The Peoples Murmurs.

A Custom of Curfing the King's Enemies at Pauls Cross.

Sir Robert Clifford is prevailed upon to serve King Henry.

There is a strange Tradition; That the King being lost in a Wood of Suspicions, and not knowing whom to trust, had both Intelligence with the Confessors and Chaplains of divers great Men, and for the better Credit of his Espials abroad with the contrary Side, did use to have them curfed at Pauls (by Name) amongst the Bead-roll of the King's Enemies, according to the Custom of those Times. These Espials plied their Charge so roundly, as the King had an Anatomy of Perkin alive; and was likewise well informed of the particular correspondent Conspirators in England, and many other Mysteries were reveal'd; and Sir Robert Clifford in especial won to be assured to the King, and industrious and officious for his Service. The King therefore (receiving a rich Return of his Diligence, and great Satisfaction touching a number of Particulars) first divulged and spread abroad the Imposture and Juggling of Perkin's Person and Travels, with the Circumstances thereof throughout the Realm. Not by Proclamation (because things were yet in Examination, and so might receive the more or the less) but by Court-fames, which commonly Print better than printed Proclamations. Then thought he it also time to send an Ambassage unto Archduke Philip into Flanders, for the abandoning and dismissing of Perkin. Herein he employ'd Sir Edward Poynings and Sir William Warham, Doctor of the Canon-Law. The Archduke was then Young, and governed by his Council: before whom the Ambassadors had Audience, and Dr. Warham spake in this manner.

"MY Lords, the King our Master is very sorry, that England and your Country here of Flanders having been counted as Man and Wife for so long time, now this Country of all others should be the Stage, where a base Counterfeit should play the part of a King of England; not only to his Grace's Disquiet and Dishonour, but to the Scorn and Reproach of all Sovereign Princes. To counterfeit the dead Image of a King in his Coyn, is an high Offence by all Laws: But to Counterfeit the living Image of a King in his Person, exceedeth all Falsifications, except it should be that of a Mahomet, or an Anti-Christ, that counterfeit Divine Honour. The King hath too great an Opinion of this Sage Council, to think that any of you is caught with this Fable (though way may be given by you to the Passion of some) the thing in it self is so improbable. To set Testimonies aside of the Death of Duke Richard, which the King hath upon Record, plain and infallible (because they may be thought to be in the King's own Power) let the thing testify for it self. Sense and Reason no Power can Command. Is it possible (trow you) that King Richard should damn his Soul, and foul his Name with so abominable a Murther, and yet not mend his Case? Or do you think, that Men of Blood (that were his Instruments) did turn to Pity in the midst of their Execution? Whereas in cruel and savage Beasts, and Men also, the first Draught of Blood doth yet make them more fierce, and enraged. Do you not know, that the Bloody Executioners of Tyrants do go to such Errands, with an Halter about their

Neck: So that if they perform not, they are sure to dye for it? And do you think, that these Men would hazard their own Lives, for sparing anothers? Admit they should have saved him: What should they have done with him? Turn him into London Streets, that the Watch-men or any Passenger that should light upon him, might carry him before a Justice, and so all come to light? Or should they have kept him by them secretly? That surely would have required a great deal of Care, Charge, and continual Fears. But (my Lords) I labour too much in a clear Business. The King is so wise, and hath so good Friends abroad, as now he knoweth Duke Perkin from his Cradle. And because he is a great Prince, if you have any good Poet here, he can help him with Notes to write his Life, and to parallel him with Lambert Simnel, now the Kings Faulconer. And therefore (to speak plainly to your Lordships) it is the strangest thing in the World, that the Lady Margaret (excuse us, if we name her, whose Malice to the King is both causeless and endless) should now when she is old, at the time when other Women give over Childbearing, bring forth two such Monsters; being not the Births of nine or ten Months, but of many Years. And whereas other Natural Mothers bring forth Children Weak, and not able to help themselves; she bringeth forth tall Striplings, able soon after their coming into the World, to bid Battel to mighty Kings. My Lords, we stay unwillingly upon this Part. We would to God, that Lady would once taste the Joys, which God Almighty doth serve up unto her, in beholding her Niece to Reign in such Honour, and with so much Royal Issue, which she might be pleased to accompt as her own. The King's Request unto the Arch-Duke, and your Lordships, might be; That according to the Example of King Charles, who hath already discarded him, you would banish this unworthy Fellow out of your Dominions. But because the King may justly expect more from an Antient Confederate, than from a new reconciled Enemy; he maketh his Request unto you, to deliver him up into his Hands. Pirates and Impostures of this sort, being fit to be accounted the Common Enemies of Mankind, and no ways to be protected by the Laws of Nations.

After some time of Deliberation, the Ambassadors received this short Answer.

The Arch-Duke's Answer to the English Ambassadors.

"THAT the Archduke, for the Love of King Henry, would in no sort aid or assist the pretended Duke, but in all things conserve the Amity he had with the King. But for the Dutchess Dowager, she was absolute in the Lands of her Dowry, and that he could not let her to dispose of her own.

The King, upon the Return of the Ambassadors, was nothing satisfied with this Answer. For well he knew, that a Patrimonial Dowry carried no part of Sovereignty, or Command of Forces. Besides, the Ambassadors told him plainly, that they saw the Dutchess had a great Party in the Arch-Duke's Council; and that howsoever it was carried in a Course of Conivence, yet the Arch-Duke under hand gave Aid and Furtherance to Perkin. Wherefore (partly out of Courage, and partly out of Policy) the King forthwith banished all Flemmings (as well their Persons, as their Wares) out of his Kingdom;

1494. Kingdom; commanding his Subjects likewise (and by name his Merchants-Adventurers) which had a Residence in Antwerp, to return; translating the Mart (which commonly followed the English Cloth) unto Calice, and imbarred also all further Trade for the future. This the King did, being sensible in point of Honour, not to suffer a Pretender to the Crown of England, to affront him so near at Hand, and he to keep Terms of Friendship with the Country where he did set up. But he had also a further reach: For that he knew well, that the Subjects of Flanders drew so great Commodity from the Trade of England, as by this Embargo they would soon wax weary of Perkin, and that the Tumults of Flanders had been so late and fresh, as it was no time for the Prince to displease the People. Nevertheless for Form's sake, by way of Requital, the Arch-Duke did likewise banish the English out of Flanders; which in effect was done to his Hand.

The Mart was removed the last Year. Why the Mart was removed from Antwerp to Calice.

The King being well advertised, that Perkin did more trust upon Friends and Partakers within the Realm, than upon forreign Arms, thought it behooved him to apply the Remedy, where the Disease lay; and to proceed with Severity against some of the principal Conspirators here within the Realm; Thereby to purge the ill Humors in England, and to cool the Hopes in Flanders. Wherefore he caused to be apprehended (almost at an instant) John Ratcliff Lord Fitzwater, Sir Simon Mountford, Sir Thomas Thwaites, William Dawbigne, Robert Ratcliff, Thomas Chresenor, and Thomas Astwood. All these were arraigned, convicted and condemned for High Treason, in adhering, and promising aid to Perkin. Of these, the Lord Fitzwater was conveyed to Calice and there kept in Hold, and in hope of Life, until soon after (either impatient, or betrayed) he dealt with his Keeper to have escaped, and thereupon was beheaded. But Sir Simon Mountford, Robert Ratcliff, and William Dawbigne were beheaded immediately after their Condemnation. The rest were pardoned, together with many others Clerks and Laikes, amongst which were two Dominican Friars, and William Worfeley, Dean of Pauls: which latter fort passed Examination, but came not to publick Trial.

Sir Simon Mountford and others beheaded.

The Lord Chamberlain at that time was not touched; whether it were, that the King would not stir too many Humours at once, but (after the manner of good Physicians) purge the Head last; or that Clifford (from whom most of these Discoveries came) reserved that Piece for his own coming over; signifying only to the King in the mean time, that he doubted there were some greater ones in the business, whereof he would give the King further accompt, when he came to his presence.

Knights of the Bath Created.

Upon Al-hallows-day-even being now the tenth year of the King's Reign, the King's second Son Henry was created Duke of York; and as well the Duke, as divers others, Noblemen, Knights Batchelours, and Gentlemen of Quality were made Knights of the Bath, according to the Ceremony. Upon the Morrow after Twelfth-Day, the King removed from Westminster (where he had kept his Christmas) to the Tower of London. This he did as soon as he had Advertisement, that Sir Robert Clifford (in whose Bosom or Budget most of Perkins Secrets were layed up) was come into England. And the place of the Tower was chosen to that end, that if Clifford should accuse any of the great ones, they might without Suspicion, or Noise, or sending abroad of Warrants, be presently attached; the Court and Prison being within the Cincture of one Wall. After a Day or two, the King drew unto him a selected Council, and admitted Clifford to his Presence; who first fell down at his Feet, and in all humble manner craved the King's Pardon, which the King then granted, though he were indeed secretly assured of his Life before. Then commanded to tell his Knowledge, he did amongst many others (of himself, not interrogated) appeach Sir William Stanley, the Lord Chamberlain of the King's Household.

The King seemed to be much amazed at the naming of this Lord, as if he had heard the News of some strange and fearful Prodigy. To hear a Man that had done him service of so high a nature, as to save his Life, and set the Crown upon his Head; a Man, that enjoyed by his Favour and Advancement so great a Fortune, both in Honour and Riches; a Man, that was tied unto him in so near a Band of Alliance, his Brother having married the King's Mother; and lastly, a Man, to whom he had committed the trust of his Person, in making him his Chamberlain. That this Man, no ways disgraced, no ways discontent, no ways put in Fear, should be false unto him. Clifford was required to say over again, and again, the Particulars of his Accusation, being warned, that in a Matter so unlikely, and that concerned so great a Servant of the King's, he should not in any wise go too far. But the King finding that he did sadly, and constantly (without Hesitation or varying, and with those Civil Protestations that were fit) stand to that that he had said, offering to justify it upon his Soul and Life; he caused him to be removed. And after he had not a little bemoaned himself unto his Council there present, gave order that Sir William Stanley should be restrained in his own Chamber, where he lay before, in the Square Tower. And the next day he was examined by the Lords. Upon his Examination, he denied little of that wherewith he was charged, nor endeavoured much to excuse or extenuate his Fault. So that (not very wisely) thinking to make his Offence less by Confession, he made it enough for Condemnation. It was conceived, that he trusted much to his former Merits, and the Interest that his Brother had in the King. But those helps were over-weighed by divers things that made against him, and were predominant in the King's Nature and Mind. First, an Over-merit; for convenient Merit, unto which Reward may easily reach, doth best with Kings: next the sense of his Power; for the King thought, that he that could set him up, was the more dangerous to pull him down. Thirdly the Glimmering of a Confiscation; for he was the Richest Subject for Value in the Kingdom; There being found in his Castle of Holt forty Thousand Marks in ready Money, and Plate, besides Jewels, Household-stuff, Stocks upon his Grounds, and other Personal Estate, exceeding great. And for his Revenue in Land and Fee, it was three thousand Pounds a Year of old Rent, a great matter in those times. Lastly, the Nature of the Time; for if the King had been out of Fear of his own Estate, it was not unlike he would have spared his Life. But the Cloud of so great a Rebellion hanging over his Head, made him Work sure. Wherefore after some six Weeks distance of time, which the King did honorably interpose, both to give space to his Brother's Intercession, and to shew to the World, that he had a Conflict with himself what he should do; he was Arraigned of High-Treason, and condemned, and presently after beheaded.

Sir William Stanley is appeach'd of Treason.

His Confession.

1495. Yet is it to this Day but in dark Memory, both what the Case of this Noble Person was, for which he suffered, and what likewise was the Ground and Cause of his Defection, and the Alienation of his Heart from the King. His Case was said to be this: That in Discourse between Sir Robert Clifford and him, he had said; That if he were sure, that that young Man were King Edward's Son, he would never bear Arms against him. This Case seems somewhat an hard Case, both in Respect of the Conditional, and in respect of the other Words. But for the Conditional, it seems the Judges of that time (who were learned Men, and the Three chief of them of the Privy Council) thought it was a dangerous thing to admit Ifs and Ands, to qualifie Words of Treason; whereby every Man might express his Malice, and blanch his Danger. And it was like to the Case (in the following Times) of Elizabeth Barton, the Holy-Maid of Kent: who had said, That if King Henry the Eighth did not take Katherine his Wife again, He should be deprived of his Crown, and dye the Death of a Dog. And infinite Cases may be put of like Nature. Which (it seemeth) the Grave Judges taking into Consideration, would not admit of Treasons upon Condition. And as for the Positive Words, That he would not bear Arms against King Edward's Son; though the Words seem calm, yet it was a plain and direct Over-ruling of the Kings Title, either by the Line of Lancaster, or by Act of Parliament. Which (no doubt) pierced the King more, than if Stanley had charged his Lance upon him in the Field. For if Stanley would hold that Opinion, that a Son of King Edward had still the better Right, he being so principal a Person of Authority, and Favour about the King; it was to teach all England, to say as much. And therefore (as those Times were) that Speech touched the Quick. But some Writers do put this out of doubt; for they say, that Stanley did expressly promise to Aid Perkin, and sent him some help of Treasure.

Why Sir William Stanley fell from the King's Interest. Now for the Motive of his falling off from the King; it is true, that at Bosworth Field the King was beset, and in a Manner inclosed round about by the Troups of King Richard, and in manifest Danger of his Life; when this Stanley was sent by his Brother, with Three thousand Men to his Rescue, which he performed so, that King Richard was slain upon the Place. So as the Condition of mortal Men is not capable of a greater Benefit, than the King received by the Hands of Stanley; being like the Benefit of Christ, at once to Save, and Crown. For which Service the King gave him great Gifts, made him his Councellour, and Chamberlain; and (somewhat contrary to his Nature) had winked at the great Spoils of Bosworth Field, which came almost wholly to this Man's Hands, to his infinite enriching. Yet nevertheless blown up with the Conceit of his Merit, he did not think he had received good Measure from the King, at least not pressing down and running over, as he expected. And his Ambition was so exorbitant, and unbounded, as he became Suitor to the King for the Earldom of Chester. Which ever being a kind of Appennage to the Principality of Wales, and using to go to the King's Son; his Suit did not only end in a Denial, but in a Distaste. The King perceiving thereby, that his Desires were intemperate, and his Cogitations vast, and irregular, and that his former Benefits were but cheap, and lightly regarded by him. Wherefore the King began not to brook him well. And as a little Leaven of new Distaste doth commonly sour the whole Lump of former Merits, the King's Wit began now to suggest unto his Passion that, Stanley, at Bosworth Field, though he came time enough to save his Life, yet he stayed long enough to endanger it. But yet having no Matter against him, he continued him in his Places, until this his Fall.

After him was made Lord Chamberlain, Giles Lord Darweny, a Man of great Sufficiency and Valour; the more, because he was gentle and moderate.

There was a common Opinion, that Sir Robert Clifford (who now was become the State-Informer) was from the beginning an Emissary, and Spie of the Kings; and that he fled over into Flanders with his Consent and Privity. But this is not probable; both because he never recovered that Degree of Grace, which he had with the King before his going over; and chiefly, for that the Discovery which he had made touching the Lord Chamberlain (which was his great Service) grew not from any thing he learn'd abroad, for that he knew it well before he went.

These Executions (and especially that of the Lord Chamberlain's, which was the chief strength of the Party, and by Means of Sir Robert Clifford, who was the most inward Man of Trust amongst them) did extremely quail the Design of Perkin, and his Complices, as well through Discouragement, as Distrust. So that they were now (like Sand without Lime) ill bound together; especially as many as were English: Who were at a Gaze, looking one upon another, not knowing who was faithful to their Side; but thinking that the King (what with his Baits, and what with his Nets) would draw them all unto him, that were any thing worth. And indeed it came to pass, that divers came away by the Thred, sometimes one, and sometimes another. Rayley (that was Joint-Commissioner with Clifford) did hold out one of the longest, till Perkin was far worn; yet made his Peace at the length. But, the Fall of this great Man, being in so high Authority and Favour (as was thought) with the King; and the Manner of Carriage of the Business, as if there had been secret Inquisition upon him, for a great time before; and the Cause for which he suffered, which was little more, than for saying in effect, That the Title of York, was better than the Title of Lancaster; which was the Case almost of every Man (at the least in Opinion;) was Matter of great Terrour amongst all the King's Servants and Subjects: Inasmuch, as no Man almost thought himself secure; and Men durst scarce commune or talk one with another: But there was a general Diffidence every where. Which nevertheless made the King rather more Absolute, than more Safe. For, Bleeding Inwards and shut Vapours strangle soonest, and oppress most.

Hereupon presently came forth Swarms and Vollics of Libels (which are the Gusts of Liberty of Speech restrained, and the Females of Sedition) containing bitter Invectives, and Slanders against the King, and some of the Council. For the contriving and dispersing whereof (after great Diligence and Inquiry) Five mean Persons were caught, and executed.

Mean while, the King did not neglect Ireland, being the Soil where the Mushromes and Upstart-Weeds (that spring up in a Night) did chiefly prosper. He sent therefore from hence (for the better settling of his Affairs there) Commissioners of both Robes: The Prior of Lantbony, † to be his Chancellour in that Kingdom;

1495. and Sir Edward Poynings with a Power of Men (a) and a Marshal Commission, together with a Civil Power of his Lieutenant, with a Clause, that the Earl of Kildare, then Deputy, should obey him. But, the Wild-Irish (who were the principal Offenders) fled into the Woods and Bogs, after their Manner: And those that knew themselves guilty, in the Pale, fled to them. So that Sir Edward Poynings, was enforced to make a Wild Chase upon the Wild-Irish: Where (in respect of the Mountains and Fastnesses) he did little good. Which (either out of a suspicious Melancholy upon his bad Success, or the better to save his Service from Disgrace) he would needs impute unto the Comfort, that the Rebels should receive under-hand from the Earl of Kildare that was in the Action of Lambert Simnel, slain at Stoke-Field. (b) Wherefore he caused the Earl to be apprehended, and sent into England; where, upon Examination, he declared himself so well, as he was re-placed in his Government. But, Poynings (the better to make Compensation of the Meagerness of his Service in the Wars; by Acts of Peace) called a Parliament; where was made that memorable Act, which at this Day is called Poynings Law, whereby all the Statutes of England were made to be of Force in Ireland. (c) For, before they were not: Neither are any now in Force in Ireland, which were made in England since that time; which was the Tenth Year of the King.

Forfeitures on Penal Laws the Blot of this Reign.

Sir William Capel Alderman of London
fin'd.

About this time, began to be discovered in the King that Disposition, which, afterward nourished and whet-on by bad Councillours and Ministers, proved the Blot of his Times; which was the Course he took, to crush Treasure out of his Subjects Purfes, by Forfeitures upon Penal-Laws. At this, Men did startle the more at this time, because it appeared plainly to be in the King's Nature, and not out of his Necessity, he being now in float for Treasure; For that he had newly received the Peace-Money from France, the Benevolence-Money from his Subjects, and great Casualties upon the Confiscations of the Lord Chamberlain, and divers others. The first noted Case of this Kind, was that of Sir William Capel, Alderman of London: Who, upon sundry Penal-Laws, was condemned in the Sum of Seven and twenty hundred Pounds, and compounded with the King for Sixteen hundred: And yet after, Empson would have cut a Chop out of him, if the King had not dyed in the Instant.

The Summer following, the King, to comfort his Mother (whom he did always tenderly love and revere) and to make Demonstration to the World, that the Proceedings against Sir William Stanley) which was imposed upon him by necessity of State) had not in any degree diminished the Affection he bore to Thomas his Brother; went in progress to Latham, to make merry with his Mother, and the Earl, and lay there divers days.

During this progress, Perkin Warbeck finding, that time and Temporizing, which (whilst his Practices were covert and wrought well in England) made for him; did now, when they were discovered and defeated, rather make against him (for that when matters once go down the Hill they stay not without a new Force) resolved to try his Adventure in some Exploit upon England;

hoping still upon the Affections of the Common-People towards the House of York. Which Body of Common-People he thought was not to be practised upon, as Persons of Quality are; But, that the only Practice upon their Affections, was, to set up a Standard in the Field. The Place where he should make his Attempt, he chose to be the Coast of Kent.

The King by this time was grown to such an height of Reputation for Cunning and Policy, that every Accident and Event, that went well, was laid and imputed to his Foresight, as if he had set it before: As, in this Particular of Perkin's Design upon Kent. For, the World would not believe afterwards, but the King, having secret Intelligence of Perkin's Intention for Kent, (the better to draw it on) went of purpose into the North, a far off, laying an open Side unto Perkin, to make him come to the close, and so to trip up his Heels, having made sure in Kent before hand.

But so it was, that Perkin had gather'd together a Power of all Nations, neither in Number, nor in the hardiness and Courage of the Persons, contemptible; but in their Nature and Fortunes, to be fear'd as well of Friends as Enemies; being Bankrupts, and many of them Felons, and such as liv'd by Rapine. These he put to Sea, and arriv'd upon the Coast of Sandwich and Deal in Kent, about July.

There he cast Anchor; and to prove the Affections of the People, sent some of his Men to Land, making great boast of the Power that was to follow. The Kentish-men (perceiving that Perkin was not follow'd by any English of Name or Account, and that his Forces consisted but of Strangers Born, and most of them base People, and Free-booters, fitter to spoil a Coast than to recover a Kingdom) resorting unto the principal Gentlemen of the Country, professed their Loyalty to the King, and desir'd to be directed and commanded for the best of the King's Service. The Gentlemen, entring into Consultation, directed some Forces in good Number, to shew themselves upon the Coast; and some of them to make Signs, to entice Perkin's Soldiers to Land, as if they would joyn with them: and some others to appear from some other Places, and to make semblance as if they fled from them; the better to encourage them to Land. But Perkin, (who, by playing the Prince, or else taught by Secretary Frion, had learn'd thus much, That People under Command do use to consult, and after to march in Order; and Rebels contrariwise run upon an Head together in Confusion) considering the Delay of Time, and observing their Orderly, and not Tumultuary Arming, doubted the worst. And therefore the wily Youth would not set one Foot out of his Ship till he might see things were sure. Wherefore the King's Forces, perceiving that they could draw on no more than those that were formerly landed, set upon them, and cut them in pieces, ere they could fly back to their Ships. In which Skirmish (besides those that fled and were slain) there were taken about an Hundred and fifty Persons. Which, for that the King thought that to punish a few for Example was Gentleman's-play, but for Rascal-people, they were to be cut off every Man, especially in the begin-

They were brought to London, all rail'd in Ropes, like a Team of Horses in a Cart; and were executed some of them at London, and Wapping, and the rest at divers Places upon the Sea-Coast of Kent, Sussex, and Norfolk, for Sea-marks or Light-houses, to teach Perkin's People to avoid the Coast. The King being advertised of the Landing of the Rebels, thought to leave his Progress: But being certifi'd the next day that they were partly defeated, and partly fled, he continued his Progress, and sent Sir Richard Guilford into Kent in Message. Who, calling the Country together, did much commend (from the King) their Fidelity, Manhood, and well-handling of that Service; and gave them all Thanks, and (in private) promis'd Reward to some Particulars.

The Serjeants were, Mr. Mordant, Higham, Kingmil, Conuby, Butler, Taxley, Frowick, Oxenbridge and Constable.

Upon the Sixteenth of November (this being the Eleventh Year of the King) was holden the Serjeants-Feast at Ely-Place; there being Nine Serjeants of that Call. The King, to honour the Feast, was present with his Queen at the Dinner; being a Prince, that was ever ready to grace and countenance the Professors of the Law; having a little of that, That as he governed his Subjects by his Laws, so he governed his Laws by his Lawyers.

The Fr. King's Errors in his Expedition to Naples.

This Year also the King entred into League with the Italian Potentates, for the Defence of Italy against France. For King Charles had conquer'd the Realm of Naples, and lost it again, in a kind of Felicity of a Dream. He pass'd the whole Length of Italy without Resistance: So that it was true which Pope Alexander was wont to say; That the Frenchmen came into Italy, with Chalk in their Hands, to mark up their Lodgings, rather than with Swords to Fight. He likewise entred and won, in effect, the whole Kingdom of Naples itself, without striking stroke. But presently thereupon he did commit and multiply so many Errors, as was too great a Task for the best Fortune to overcome. He gave no Contentment to the Barons of Naples, of the Faction of the Angevines; but scatter'd his Rewards according to the mercenary Appetites of some about him. He put all Italy upon their Guard, by the seizing and holding of Ostia, and the protecting of the Liberty of Pisa; which made all Men suspect that his Purposes look'd further, than his Title of Naples. He fell too soon at difference with Ludovico Sfortia; who was the Man that carried the Keys which brought him in, and shut him out. He neglected to extinguish some Relicks of the War. And lastly, in regard of his easy Passage through Italy without Resistance, he entred into an overmuch despising of the Arms of the Italians: Whereby he left the Realm of Naples at his Departure so much the less provided. So that not long after his Return, the whole Kingdom revolted to Ferdinando the Younger, and the French were quite driven out. Nevertheless, Charles did make both great Threats and great Preparations to re-enter Italy once again. Wherefore at the instance of divers of the States of Italy (and especially of Pope Alexander) there was a League concluded between the said Pope, Maximilian King of Romans, Henry King of England, Ferdinando and Isabella, King and Queen of Spain (for so they are constantly placed in the Original Treaty throughout) Augustissimo Barbado, Duke of Venice, and Ludovico Sfortia, Duke of Milan, for the common defence of their Estates. Wherein though

Ferdinando of Naples was not nam'd as principal; yet, no doubt, the Kingdom of Naples was tacitly included, as a Fee of the Church.

There died also this Year Cecile Dutches of York, Mother to King Edward IV. at her Castle of Barkhamsted, being of extreme Years; and who had liv'd to see Three Princes of her Body crown'd, and Four murder'd. She was Buried at Foderingham by her Husband.

This Year also the King call'd his Parliament: where many Laws were made, of a more Private and Vulgar Nature, than ought to detain the Reader of an History. And it may be justly suspected by the Proceedings following, that as the King did excel in good Commonwealth Laws; so nevertheless he had, in secret, a Design to make use of them, as well for collecting of Treasure, as for correcting of Manners; and so, meaning thereby to harrow his People, did accumulate them the rather.

The principal Law that was made this Parliament, was a Law of a strange Nature: rather Just, than Legal; and more Magnanimous than Provident. This Law did Ordain, That no Person, that did assist in Arms, or otherwise, the King for the time being, should after be Impeached therefore, or Attainted, either by the Course of the Law, or by Act of Parliament: But, if any such Act of Attainder did happen to be made, it should be Void and of none Effect; For that it was agreeable to Reason of Estate, that the Subject should not enquire of the Justness of the King's Title, or Quarrel; and it was agreeable to good Conscience, that (whatsoever the Fortune of the War were) the Subject should not suffer for his Obedience. The spirit of this Law was wonderful Pious and Noble: being like in matter of War, unto the spirit of David in matter of Plague, who said, if I have sinned, strike me; but what have these sheep done? Neither wanted this Law Parts of prudent and deep foresight. For, it did the better take away Occasion for the People to busy themselves, to pry into the King's Title; for that howsoever it fell their Safety was already provided for. Besides, it could not but greatly draw unto him the Love and Hearts of the People, because he seem'd more careful for them than for himself. But yet nevertheless, it did take off from his Party, that great Tie and Spur of Necessity, to Fight and go Victors out of the Field; considering their Lives and Fortunes were put in Safety, and protected, whether they stood to it or ran away. But the Force and Obligation of this Law was in it self Illusory, as to the latter part of it; by a precedent Act of Parliament, to bind or frustrate a Future. For a Supreme and Absolute Power cannot conclude it self, neither can that which is in Nature revocable be made fix'd, no more than if a Man should appoint or declare by his Will, that if he made any Latter Will, it should be Void. And for the Case of the Act of Parliament, there is a notable President of it in King Henry the VIII's Time; who doubting he might dye in the Minority of his Son, procur'd an Act to Pass, That no Statute made during the Minority of the King should bind him or his Successors, except it were confirmed by the King under his Great Seal, at his full Age. But the first Act that pass'd in King Edward the VI's Time, was an Act of Repeal of that former Act; at which time nevertheless the King was Minor. But things that do not bind, may satisfy for the time.

There was also made a shoaring or underpropping Act for the Benevolence; to make the Sums which any Person had agreed to pay, and nevertheless were not brought in, to be leviable by

A strange Law.

1495. by Course of Law. Which Act did not only bring in the Arrears, but did indeed countenance the whole Business, and was pretended to be made at the Desire of those that had been forward to pay.

A good Law.

This Parliament also was made that good Law, which gave the Attaint upon a False Verdict between Party and Party, which before was a kind of Evangile, irremediable. It extends not to causes Capital, as well because they are for the most part at the King's Suit; as because in them (if they be follow'd in Course of Indictment) there passeth a double Jury, the Indictors, and the Triers; and so not Twelve Men, but Four and twenty. But it seemeth that was not the only Reason; for this Reason holdeth not in the Appeal. But the great Reason was, lest it should tend to the Discouragement of Jurors in Cases of Life and Death; if they should be subject to Suit and Penalty, where the Favour of Life maketh against them. It extendeth not also to any Suit, where the Demand is under the Value of Forty Pounds; for that in such Cases of Petty Value, it would not quit the Charge to go about again.

There was another Law made against a branch of Ingratitude in Women, who having been advanced by their Husbands, or their Husbands Ancestors, should alien, and thereby seek to defeat the Heirs, or those in Remainder, of the Lands, whereunto they had been so advanced. The Remedy was, by giving Power to the next, to enter for a Forfeiture.

An Act pass'd for Suing in Forma Pauperis.

There was also enacted that Charitable Law, for the Admission of poor Suiters In Forma Pauperis, without Fee to Counsellor, Attorney, or Clerk, whereby Poor Men became rather Able to Vex, than Unable to Sue. There were divers other good Laws made that Parliament, as we said before: But we still observe our manner, in selecting out those, that are not of a Vulgar Nature.

The King this while, tho' he sat in Parliament, as in full Peace, and seem'd to account of the Designs of Perkin (who was now return'd into Flanders) but as a May-Game; yet having the Composition of a Wife King (Stout without, and Apprehensive within) had given order for the watching of Beacons upon the Coasts, and erecting more where they stood too thin, and had a careful Eye where this wandering Cloud would break. But Perkin advis'd to keep his Fire (which hitherto burn'd as it were upon green Wood) alive, with continual blowing; Sail'd again into Ireland, whence he had formerly departed, rather upon the Hopes of France, than upon any Unreadiness or Discouragement he found in that People. But in the space of time between, the King's Diligence and Poyning's Commission, had so settled things there, as there was nothing left for Perkin, but the blustering Affection of wild and naked People. Wherefore he was advis'd by his Council, to seek Aid of the King of Scotland; a Prince Young and Valorous, and in good Terms with his Nobles and People, and ill-affected to King Henry. At this time also both Maximilian and Charles of France began to bear no good will to the King. The one being displeased with the King's Prohibition of Commerce with Flanders: The other holding the King for suspect, in regard of his late entry into League with the Italians. Wherefore besides the open Aids of the Dutchess of Burgundy, which did with Sails and Oars put on and advance Perkin's Designs, there wanted not some secret Tides from Maximilian and Charles, which did further his Fortunes. Inasmuch as they, both by their secret Letters and Messages, recommended him to the King of Scotland.

Perkin therefore coming into Scotland upon those Hopes, with a well appointed Company, was by the King of Scots * (being formerly well prepared) honourably welcom'd, and soon after his Arrival admitted to his Presence in a Solemn manner. For the King receiv'd him in State in his Chamber of Presence, accompany'd with divers of his Nobles. And Perkin well attended, as well with those that the King had sent before him, as with his own Train, entered the Room where the King was, and coming near to the King, and bowing a little to embrace him, he retired some Paces back, and with a loud Voice (that all that were present might hear him) made his Declaration in this manner:

High and Mighty King, your Grace, and these your Nobles here present, may be pleased benignly to bow your Ears, to hear the Tragedy of a Young Man, that by Right ought to hold in his Hand the Ball of a Kingdom; but by Fortune is made Himself a Ball, tossed from Misery to Misery, and from Place to Place. You see here before you the Spectacle of a Plantagenet, who hath been carried from the Nursery to the Sanctuary; from the Sanctuary to the direful Prison; from the Prison, to the Hand of the cruel Tormentor; and from that Hand, to the wide Wilderness (as I may truly call it) for so the World hath been to me. So that he that is born to a great Kingdom, hath not Ground to set his foot upon, more than this where he now standeth, by your Princely Favour. Edward the Fourth, late King of England, (as your Grace cannot but have heard) left two Sons; Edward, and Richard Duke of York, both very young. Edward the Eldest, succeeded their Father in the Crown, by the Name of King Edward V. But Richard Duke of Gloucester, their Unnatural Uncle, first thirsting after the Kingdom, through Ambition, and afterwards thirsting for their Blood, out of Desire to secure himself, imploy'd an Instrument of his (confident to him, as he thought) to murder them both. But this Man that was imploy'd to execute that execrable Tragedy, having cruelly Slain King Edward, the Eldest of the two, was moved partly by Remorse, and partly by some other mean, to save Richard his Brother; making a Report nevertheless to the Tyrant, that he had perform'd his Commandment for both Brethren. This Report was accordingly believ'd, and publish'd generally. So that the World hath been possessed of an Opinion that they both were barbarously made away, tho' ever Truth hath some sparks that fly abroad until it appear in due time, as this hath had. But Almighty God that stopped the Mouth of the Lion, and saved little Joas from the Tyranny of Athaliah, when she massacred the King's Children; and did save Isaac, when the hand was stretch'd forth to Sacrifice him; preserv'd the second Brother. For I my self, that stand here in your Presence, am that very Richard Duke of York, Brother of that Infortunate Prince, King Edward V. now the most right-ful surviving Heir-Male to that Victorious and most Noble Edward, of that Name the Fourth, late King of England. For the manner of my Escape, it is fit it should pass in Silence, or (at least) in a more secret Relation: for that it may concern some alive, and the Memory of some

Perkin's Declaration to the Scottish King.

Edward the Fifth murder'd.

1495. "some that are Dead. Let it suffice to think, that I had then a Mother living, a Queen, and one that expected daily such a Commandment from the Tyrant, for the murdering of her Children. Thus in my tender Age escaping by God's Mercy out of London, I was secretly convey'd over Sea. Where, after a time, the Party that had me in Charge, (upon what new Fears, change of Mind, or Practice God knoweth) suddenly forsook me. Whereby I was forced to wander abroad, and to seek mean Conditions for the sustaining of my Life. Wherefore distracted between several Passions, the one of Fear to be known, left the Tyrant should have a new Attempt upon me; the other of Grief and Disdain to be unknown, and to live in that base and servile manner that I did; I resolv'd with my self to expect the Tyrant's Death, and then to put my self into my Sister's hands, who was next Heir to the Crown. But in this Season, it happen'd one Henry Tiddler, Son to Edmond Tiddler Earl of Richmond, to come from France and enter into the Realm, and by subtle and foul Means to obtain the Crown of the same, which to me rightfully appertain'd. So that it was but a Change from Tyrant to Tyrant. This Henry, my extream and mortal Enemy, so soon as he had Knowledge of my being alive, imagin'd and wrought all the subtil Ways and Means he could, to procure my final Destruction. For my mortal Enemy hath not only falsely surmised me to be a feign'd Person, giving me Nick-names, so abusing the World; but also to defer and put me from entry into England, hath offer'd large Sums of Money, to corrupt the Princes and their Ministers, with whom I have been retained; and made importune Labours to certain Servants about my Person, to Murder or Poison me, and others to forsake and leave my Righteous Quarrel and to depart from my Service, as Sir Robert Clifford, and others. So that every Man of Reason may well perceive that Henry, calling himself King of England, need not to have bestow'd such great Sums of Treasure, nor so to have busy'd himself with importune and incessant Labour and Industry, to compass my Death and Ruin, if I had been such a feign'd Person. But the truth of my Cause being so manifest, moved the most Christian King Charles, and the Lady Dutche's Dowager of Burgundy, my most dear Aunt, not only to Acknowledge the Truth thereof, but lovingly to assist me. But it seemeth that God above (for the good of this whole Island, and the knitting of these two Kingdoms of England and Scotland in a strait Concord and Amity, by so great an Obligation) had reserv'd the placing of me in the Imperial Throne of England, for the Arms and Succours of your Grace. Neither is it the first time that a King of Scotland hath supported them, that were bereft and spoiled of the Kingdom of England; as of late (in fresh Memory) it was done in the Person of Henry VI. Wherefore for that your Grace hath given clear Signs, that you are in no Noble Quality inferior to your Royal Ancestors; I, so distressed a Prince, was hereby moved to come and put my Self into your Royal Hands, desiring your Assistance to recover my Kingdom of England; promising faithfully to bear my Self towards your Grace no otherwise, than if I were your own Natural Brother, and will upon the Recovery of mine Inheritance, gratefully do you all the Pleasure that is in my utmost Power. 1495.

After Perkin had told his Tale, King James answer'd bravely and wisely, That whatsoever he were, he should not repent him of putting himself into his hands. And from that time forth, tho' there wanted not some about him, that would have perswaded him, that all was but an Illusion; yet notwithstanding, either taken by Perkin's amiable and alluring Behaviour, or inclining to the Recommendation of the great Princes abroad, or willing to take an Occasion of a War against King Henry, he entertain'd him in all things, as became the Person of Richard Duke of York; embraced his Quarrel; and (the more to put it out of Doubt, that he took him to be a great Prince, and not a Representation only) he gave Consent, that this Duke should take to Wife the Lady Katherine Gordon, Daughter to the E. of Huntley, being a near Kinswoman to the King himself, and a young Virgin of excellent Beauty and Vertue. The Scots King favours Perkin.

Not long after, (d) the King of Scots in Person, with Perkin in his Company, entred with a great Army (though it consisted chiefly of Borderers, being raised somewhat suddenly) into Northumberland. And Perkin for a Perfume before him as he went, caus'd to be publish'd a Proclamation of this Tenor following, in the Name of Richard Duke of York, true Inheritor of the Crown of England. The King of Scots invades England.

IT hath pleased God, who putteth down the Mighty from their Seat, and exalteth the Humble, and suffereth not the Hopes of the Just to perish in the end, to give us means at the length, to shew our Selves armed unto our Lieges and People of England. But far be it from us, to intend their Hurt and Damage, or to make War upon them, otherwise than to deliver our Self and them from Tyranny and Oppression. For, our mortal Enemy Henry Tiddler, a false Usurper of the Crown of England, (which to us by Natural and Lineal Right appertaineth) knowing in his own Heart our undoubted Right, (we being the very Richard Duke of York, younger Son, and now surviving Heir Male of the Noble and Victorious Edward IV. late King of England) hath not only deprived us of our Kingdom, but likewise by all foul and wicked means sought to betray us, and bereave us of our Life. Yet it his Tyranny only extended it self to our Person (altho' our Royal Blood teacheth us to be sensible of Injuries) it should be less to our Grief. But this Tiddler, who boasteth himself to have Overthrown a Tyrant, hath ever since his first Entrance into his usurped Reign, put little in Practice but Tyranny and the Feats thereof. The Original of this Proclamation remaineth with Sir Robert Cotton, a worthy Preserver and Treasurer of rare Antiquities: from whose Manuscripts I have had much light for the furnishing of this Work.

For King Richard our Unnatural Uncle, altho' Desire of Rule did blind him, yet in his other Actions (like a true Plantagenet) was Noble, and lov'd the Honour of the Realm, and the Contentment and Comfort of his Nobles and People. But this our Mortal Enemy (agreeable to the Meanness of his Birth) hath trodden under foot the Honour of this Nation; selling our best Confederates for Money,

“ and making Merchandize of the Blood, Estates, and Fortunes of our Peers and Subjects, by feigned Wars and dishonourable Peace, only to enrich his Coffers. Nor unlike hath been his hateful Mis-government, and evil Deportments at Home. First, he hath (to fortify his false Quarrel) caused divers Nobles of this our Realm (whom he held Suspect, and stood in Dread of) to be cruelly murther'd; as our Cousin Sir William Stanley Lord Chamberlain, Sir Simon Mountfort, Sir Robert Ratcliffe, William Dawbency, Humphrey Stafford, and many others, besides such as have dearly bought their Lives with intolerable Ransoms. Some of which Nobles are now in the Sanctuary. Also he hath long kept, and yet keepeth in Prison, our right entirely wel-beloved Cosen Edward, Son and Heir to our Uncle Duke of Clarence, and others; with-holding from them their rightful Inheritance, to the intent they should never be of Might and Power to Aid and Assist us at our need, after the Duty of their Liegeances. He also married by Compulsion certain of our Sisters, and also the Sister of our said Cosen the Earl of Warwick, and divers other Ladies of the Royal Blood, certain of his Kinsmen and Friends of simple and low Degree; and putting apart all well-disposed Nobles, he hath none in Favour and Trust about his Person, but Bishop Fox, Smith, Bray, Lovel, Oliver King, David Owen, Riseley, Turbervile, Tiler, Cholmley, Empson, James Hobart, John Cut, Garth, Henry Wyat, and such other Caitiffs and Villains of Birth, which by subtil Inventions and Pilling of the People, have been the principal Finders, Occasioners, and Counsellors of the Mis-rule and Mischief now reigning in England.

“ We remembering these Premises, with the great and execrable Offences daily committed, and done by our foresaid great Enemy, and his Adherents, in breaking the Liberties and Franchises of our Mother the Holy Church, upon Pretences of Wicked and Heathenish Policy, to the high Displeasure of Almighty God; besides the manifold Treasons, abominable Murthers, Man-slaughters, Robberies, Extortions, the daily Pilling of the People, by Dismes, Taxes, Tallages, Benevolences, and other unlawful Impositions, and grievous Exactions, with many other heinous Effects, to the likely Destruction and Desolation of the whole Realm: shall by God's Grace, and the Help and Assistance of the great Lords of our Blood, with the Counsel of other sad Persons, see that the Commodities of our Realm be imploy'd to the most Advantage of the same; the intercourse of Merchandize betwixt Realm and Realm, to be ministred and handled, as shall more be to the Common-weal and Prosperity of our Subjects; and all such Dismes, Taxes, Tallages, Benevolences, unlawful Impositions, and grievous Exactions, as be above rehearsed, to be foredone and laid apart, and never from henceforth to be called upon, but in such Cases as our Noble Progenitors Kings of England, have of old Time been accustomed to have the Aid, Succour, and Help of their Subjects and true Liege-men.

“ And further, we do out of our Grace and Clemency, hereby as well Publish and Promise to all our Subjects Remission and free Pardon of all By-past Offences whatsoever, against our Person, or Estate, in adhering to our said Enemy, by whom (we know well) they have been mis-led, if they shall within time convenient submit themselves unto us. 1495.

“ And for such as shall come with the foremost, to assist our righteous Quarrel, we shall make them so far Partakers of our Princely Favour and Bounty, as shall be highly for the Comfort of them and theirs, both during their Life, and after their Death. As also we shall by all means, which God shall put into our hands, demean our selves to give Royal Contentment to all Degrees and Estates of our People, maintaining the Liberties of Holy Church in their entire, preserving the Honours, Privileges, and Preheminences of our Nobles from Contempt or Disparagement, according to the Dignity of their Blood. We shall also Unyoke our People from all heavy Burthens and Endurances, and confirm our Cities, Boroughs, and Towns, in their Charters and Freedoms, with Inlargement, where it shall be deserv'd; and in all Points give our Subjects cause to think, that the blessed and debonaire Government of our Noble Father King Edward (in his last times) is in us revived.

“ And for as much as the putting to Death, or taking alive of our said Mortal Enemy, may be a mean to stay much Effusion of Blood, which otherwise may ensue, if by Compulsion or fair promises, he shall draw after him any number of our Subjects to resist us; which we desire to avoid (though we be certainly informed that our said Enemy is purposed and prepared to fly the Land, having already made over great Masses of the Treasure of our Crown, the better to support him in Forreign Parts) we do hereby declare, that whosoever shall take or distress our said Enemy (though the Party be of never so mean a Condition) he shall be by us rewarded with a Thousand Pound in Money, forthwith to be laid down to him, and an Hundred Marks by the Year of Inheritance; besides that he may otherwise merit, both toward God and all good People, for the destruction of such a Tyrant.

“ Lastly, we do all Men to wit, and herein we take also God to witness, That whereas God hath moved the Heart of our Dearest Cousin, the King of Scotland, to Aid us in Person, in this our Righteous Quarrel; it is altogether without any Pact or Promise, or so much as Demand of any thing, that may prejudice our Crown or Subjects: But contrariwise with Promise on our said Cousin's part, that whensoever he shall find us in sufficient strength to get the upper Hand of our Enemy (which we hope will be very suddenly) he will forthwith peaceably return into his own Kingdom; contenting himself only with the Glory of so Honourable an Enterprize, and our true and faithful Love and Amity. Which we shall ever (by the Grace of Almighty God) so order, as shall be to the great Comfort of both Kingdoms.

But Perkins Proclamation did little edifie with the People of England; neither was he the better welcome for the company he came in. Wherefore the King of Scotland seeing none came in to Perkin, nor none stirred any where in his Favour, turned his enterprize into a Rode; and wasted and destroyed the Country of Northumberland, with Fire and Sword. But hearing that there were Forces coming against him, and not willing that they should find his Men heavy and laden with Booty, he returned into Scotland with great Spoils, deferring further Prosecution, till another time. It is said, that Perkin acting the part 1496. part of a Prince handsomly, when he saw the Scottish fell to waft the Country, came to the King in a passionate manner, making great lamentation, and desired, That that might not be the manner of making the War; for that no Crown was so dear to his Mind, as that he desired to purchase it with the Blood and ruin of his Country. Whereunto the King answered half in sport; that he doubted much, he was careful for that that was none of his, and that he should be too good a Steward for his Enemy, to save the Country to his use.

The Decay of Trade by the War.

By this Time, being the eleventh Year of the King, the Interruption of Trade between the English and the Flemish, began to pinch the Merchants of both Nations very sore. Which moved them, by all means they could devise, to affect and dispose their Sovereigns respectively, to open the Entercourse again. Wherein, time favoured them. For the Arch-Duke and his Council began to see, that Perkin would prove but a Runagate, and Citizen of the World; and that it was the part of Children to fall out about Babies. And the King on his part, after the Attempts upon Kent and Northumberland, began to have the Business of Perkin in less Estimation; so as he did not put it to account, in any Consultation of State. But that that moved him most, was, that being a King that loved Wealth and Treasure, he could not endure to have Trade sick, nor any Obstruction to continue in the Gate-vein, which dispersed that Blood. And yet he kept State so far, as first to be sought unto. Wherein the Merchant-Adventurers likewise, (being a strong Company at that time, and well underfet with Rich Men, and good order) did hold out bravely; taking off the Commodities of the Kingdom, though they lay dead upon their Hands for want of Vent. At the last, Commissioners met at London, to treat. On the King's part; Bishop Fox Lord Privy Seal, Viscount Wells, Kendal Prior of Saint Johns, Warham Master of the Rolls, who began to gain much upon the King's Opinion; Uswick, who was almost ever one; and Riseley. On the Arch-Duke's part, the Lord Bewers his Admiral, the Lord Verunel President of Flanders, and others. These concluded a perfect Treaty, both of Amity and Interchange, between the King and the Arch-Duke; containing Articles both of State, Commerce and Free-fishing. This is that Treaty, which the Flemings call at this Day, Intercursus Magnus; both because it is more compleat, than the precedent Treaties, of the Third and Fourth Years of the King: and chiefly to give it a Difference, from the Treaty that followed in the one and twentieth Year of the King: which they call Intercursus Malus. In this Treaty, there was an expresse Article against the Reception of the Rebels of either Prince by other; purporting, that if any such Rebel should be required by the Prince whose Rebel he was, of the Prince Confederate, that forthwith the Prince Confederate should by Proclamation command him to avoid the Country. Which if he did not within fifteen Days, the Rebel was to stand proscrib'd, and put out of Protection. But nevertheless in this Article, Perkin was not named, neither perhaps contained, because he was no Rebel. But by this means his Wings were clipt of his Followers, that were English. And it was expressly comprised in the Treaty, that it should extend to the Territories of the Dutche's Dowager. After the Interchange thus restored, the English Merchants came again to their Mansion at Antwerp, where they were received with Procession and great Joy.

The Winter following, being the Twelfth Year of his Reign, the King called again his Parliament: where he did much exaggerate both the Malice, and the cruel Predatory War lately made by the King of Scotland; That that King, being in Amity with him, and no ways provok'd, should so burn in Hatred towards him, as to drink of the Lees and Dreggs of Perkin's Intoxication, who was every where else detected and discarded: And that when he perceived it was out of his Reach, to do the King any Hurt, he had turned his Arms upon unarmed and unprovided People to spoil only and depopulate, contrary to the Laws both of War and Peace: Concluding, that he could neither with Honour, nor with the safety of his People, to whom he did owe Protection, let pass these Wrongs unrevenge'd. The Parliament understood him well, and gave him a Subsidy, limited to the Sum of one hundred and twenty thousand Pounds, besides two Fifteens. For his Wars were always to him as a Mine of Treasure, of a strange kind of Ore; Iron at the Top, and Gold and Silver at the bottom. At this Parliament (for that there had been so much time spent in making Laws the Year before, and for that it was called purposely in respect of the Scottish War) there were no Laws made to be remembered. Only there passed a Law, at the Sute of the Merchant-Adventurers of England, against the Merchant-Adventurers of London, for Monopolizing and exacting upon the Trade: Which it seemeth they did, a little to save themselves, after the hard time they had sustained by want of Trade. But those Innovations were taken away by Parliament.

But it was fatal to the King, to fight for his Money. And though he avoided to fight with Enemies abroad, yet he was still enforced to fight for it with Rebels at home. For no sooner began the Subsidy to be levied in Cornwall, but the People there began to grudge and murmur.

The Cornish being a Race of Men, stout of Stomack, mighty of Body and Limb, and that lived hardly in a barren Country, and many of them could (for a need) live under Ground, that were Tinnners; they muttered extreemly, that it was a thing not to be suffered, that for a little Stir of the Scots, soon blown over, they should be thus grinded to Powder with Payments: And said, it was for them to pay, that had too much, and lived idly. But they would eat the Bread they got with the Sweat of their Brows, and no Man should take it from them. And as in the Tides of People once up, there want not commonly stirring Winds to make them more rough: So this People did light upon two Ringleaders, or Captains of the Rout. The one was one Michael Joseph, a Blacksmith or Farrier of Bodmin; a notable talking Fellow, and no less desirous to be talked of. The other was Thomas Flammeck, a Lawyer; who by telling his Neighbours commonly upon any occasion, that the Law was on their side, had gotten great sway amongst them. This Man talked Learnedly, and as if he could tell how to make a Rebellion, and never break the Peace. He told the People, that Subsidies were not to be granted nor levied in this Case; that is, for Wars of Scotland (for that the Law had provided another Course, by service of Escuage, for those Journeys) much less when all was quiet, and War was made but a Pretence to Poll and Pill the People: And therefore that it was good they should not stand now like Sheep before the Shearers, but put on Harness, and take Weapons in their Hands: Yet to do no Creature hurt; but go and deliver the King a 1497. Strong Petition, for the laying down of those grievous Payments, and for the Punishment of those that had given him that Counsel; to make others beware how they did the like in time to come: And said, for his part he did not see how they could do the Duty of true English Men, and good Liege Men, except they did deliver the King from such wicked Ones that would destroy both him and the Country. Their Aim was at Arch Bishop Morton, and Sir Reginald Bray, who were the King's Screens in this Envy.

After that these two, Flammock and the Blacksmith, had by Joynt and several Pratings, found Tokens of Consent in the Multitude, they offered themselves to lead them, until they should hear of better Men to be their Leaders; which they said would be ere long: Telling them further, that they would be but their Servants, and first in every Danger; but doubted not but to make both the West End and the East End of England to meet in so good a Quarrel; and that all (rightly understood) was but for the King's Service. The People, upon these Seditious Instigations, did Arm (most of them with Bows, and Arrows, and Bills, and such other Weapons of Rude and Country People) and forthwith under the Command of their Leaders (which in such Cases is ever at pleasure) marched out of Corn-wall, through Devonshire, and Taunton in Somersetshire, without any Slaughter, Violence, or Spoil of the Country. At Taunton they killed, in fury, an Officious and eager Commissioner for the Subsidy, whom they called the Provost of Perin. Thence they marched to Wells: where the Lord Audley (with whom their Leaders had, before, some secret Intelligence) a Noble-man of an Ancient Family, but unquiet and popular, and aspiring to Ruin, came in to them, and was by them (with great Gladness and Cries of Joy) accepted as their General; they being now proud, that they were led by a Noble-man. The Lord Audley led them on from Wells to Salisbury, and from Salisbury to Winchester. Thence the foolish People, who (in effect) led their Leaders, had a Mind to be led into Kent; fancying, that the People there would joyn with them, contrary to all Reason or Judgment; considering, the Kentish-men had shewed great Loyalty and Affection to the King so lately before. But the rude People had heard Flammock say, that Kent was never conquered, and that they were the freest People of England. And, upon these vain Noises, they looked for great matters at their Hands, in a Cause which they conceived to be for the Liberty of the Subject. But when they were come into Kent, the Country was so well settled, both by the King's late kind Usage towards them, and by the Credit and Power of the Earl of Kent, the Lord Abergavenny, and the Lord Cobham, as neither Gentleman nor Yeoman came in to their Aid; which did much damp and dismay many of the simpler sort: Infomuch, as divers of them did secretly fly from the Army, and went home. But the sturdier sort, and those that were most engaged, stood by it, and rather waxed proud, than fail'd in Hopes and Courage. For as it did somewhat appall them, that the People came not in to them; so it did no less encourage them, that the King's Forces had not set upon them, having marched from the West unto the East of England. Wherefore they kept on their Way, and encamped upon Black-beath, between Greenwich and Eltham; threatening either to bid Battel to the King (for now the Seas went higher than to Morton, and Braie) or to take London within his view; imagining with themselves, there to find no less Fear, than Wealth.

But to return to the King. When first he heard of this Commotion of the Cornish-men, occasioned by the Subsidy, he was much troubled therewith: Not for it felt, but in regard of the Concurrence of other Dangers, that did hang over him at that time. For he doubted least a War from Scotland, a Rebellion from Cornwall, and the Practices and Conspiracies of Perkin and his Partakers, would come upon him at once; Knowing well, that it was a dangerous Triplicity to a Monarchy, to have the Arms of a Forreiner, the Discontents of Subjects, and the Title of a Pretender, to meet. Nevertheless, the Occasion took him in some part well provided. For as soon as the Parliament had broken up, the King had presently raised a Puissant Army, to War upon Scotland. And King James of Scotland likewise, on his part, had made great Preparations either for Defence, or for new assailing of England. But as for the King's Forces, they were not only in preparation, but in readiness presently to set forth, under the Conduct of Daubeney, the Lord Chamberlain. But as soon as the King understood of the Rebellion of Cornwall, he stayed those Forces, retaining them for his own Service and Safety. But therewithal he dispatched the Earl of Surry into the North, for the Defence and strength of those Parts, in case the Scots should stir. But for the Course he held towards the Rebels, it was utterly differing from his former Custom, and Practice; which was ever full of Forwardness and Celerity, to make head against them, or to set upon them as soon as ever they were in Action. This he was wont to do. But now, besides that he was attuned by Years, and less in Love with Dangers, by the continued Fruition of a Crown; it was a time when the various Appearance to his Thoughts of Perils of several Natures, and from divers Parts, did make him judge it his best and surest Way, to keep his Strength together, in the Seat and Center of his Kingdom. According to the Ancient Indian Emblem; in such a swelling Season, To hold the Hand upon the middle of the Bladder, that no side might rise. Besides, there was no necessity put upon him, to alter this Counsel. For neither did the Rebels spoil the Country; in which Case it had been Dishonour to abandon his People: Neither on the other side, did their Forces gather or encrease, which might hasten him to precipitate and assail them, before they grew too strong. And lastly, both Reason of Estate and War seemed to agree with this Course; For that Insurrections of base People are commonly more furious in their Beginnings. And by this means also he had them the more at Vantage, being tyred and harrassed with a long March; and more at Mercy, being cut off far from their Country, and therefore not able by any suddain Flight to get to retreat, and to renew the Troubles.

When therefore the Rebels were encamped on Black-Heath, upon the Hill, whence they might behold the City of London, and the fair Valley about it: the King knowing well, that it stood him upon, by how much the more he had hitherto protracted the time in not encountering them, by so much the sooner to dispatch with them, that it might appear to have been no Coldness in foreslowing, but Wisdom in choosing his time; resolved with all speed to assail them, and yet with that Providence, and Surety, as should leave little to Venture or Fortune. And having very great and puissant Forces about him, the better to master all Events and Accidents, 1497. Accidents, he divided them into three Parts. The first was led by the Earl of Oxford in chief, assisted by the Earls of Essex and Suffolk. These Noblemen were appointed, with some Cornets of Horse, and Bands of Foot, and good store of Artillery wheeling about, to put themselves beyond the Hill, where the Rebels were encamped; and to beset all the Skirts and Descents thereof, except those that lay towards London; whereby to have these Wild Beasts (as it were) in a Toil. The second Part of his Forces (which were those that were to be most in Action, and upon which he relied most for the Fortune of the Day) he did assign to be led by the Lord Chamberlain, who was appointed to set upon the Rebels in Front, from that side which is toward London. The third Part of his Forces (being likewise great and brave Forces) he retained about himself, to be ready upon all Events, to restore the Fight, or consummate the Victory; and mean while, to secure the City. And for that purpose he encamped in Person in St George's Fields, putting himself between the City, and the Rebels. But the City of London (especially at the first) upon the near encamping of the Rebels, was in great Tumult: As it useth to be with wealthy and Populous Cities (especially those, which, for Greatness and Fortune, are Queens of their Regions) who seldom see out of their Windows, or from their Towers, an Army of Enemies. But that which troubled them most, was the Conceit, that they dealt with a Rout of People, with whom there was no Composition, or Condition, or orderly treating if need were; but likely to be bent altogether upon Rapin and Spoil. And although they had heard, that the Rebels had behaved themselves quietly and modestly, by the way as they went; yet they doubted much, that would not last, but rather make them more hungry, and more in appetite, to fall upon Spoil in the end. Wherefore there was great running to and fro of People, some to the Gates, some to the Walls, some to the Water side; giving themselves Alarms, and Panick Fears continually. Nevertheless, both Tate the Lord Mayor, and Shaw and Haddon the Sheriffs, did their Parts stoutly and well, in arming and ordering the People. And the King likewise did adjoin some Captains of Experience in the Wars, to advise and assist the Citizens. But soon after, when they understood that the King had so ordered the Matter, that the Rebels must winn three Battels, before they could approach the City, and that he had put his own Person between the Rebels and them, and that the great Care was rather how to impound the Rebels, that none of them might escape, than that any doubt was made to vanquish them; they grew to be quiet and out of Fear. The rather, for the Confidence they reposed which (was not small) in the three Leaders, Oxford, Essex, and Dawbeny; all, Men famed and loved amongst the People. As for Jasper Duke of Bedford, whom the King used to employ with the first in his Wars, he was then sick, and dyed soon after.

It was the Two and twentieth of June, and a Saturday (which was the Day of the Week the King fancied) when the Battel was fought; though the King had, by all the Art he could devise, given out a false Day, as if he prepared to give the Rebels Battel on the Monday following, the better to find them unprovided, and in disarray. The Lords that were appointed to circle the Hill, had some Days before planted themselves (as at the Receipt) in Places convenient. In the afternoon towards the Decline of the Day (which was done, the better to keep the Rebels in Opinion that they should not fight that Day) the Lord Dawbeny marched on towards them, and first beat some Troops of them from Desford-bridge, where they fought manfully; but being in no great number were soon driven back, and fled up to their main Army upon the Hill. The Army, at that time hearing of the Approach of the King's Forces, were putting themselves in Array, not without much Confusion. But neither had they placed upon the first high ground towards the Bridge, any Forces to second the Troops below, that kept the Bridge; neither had they brought forwards their Main Battel (which stood in Array far into the Heath) near to the Ascent of the Hill. So that the Earl with his Forces mounted the Hill, and recovered the Plain, without Resistance. The Lord Dawbeny charged them with great Fury; Inasmuch, as it had like (by accident) to have brandled the Fortune of the Day. For, by inconsiderate Forwardness in fighting in the Head of his Troops, he was taken by the Rebels; but immediately rescued, and delivered. The Rebels maintained the Fight for a small time, and for their Persons shewed no want of Courage: But being ill armed, and ill led, and without Horse and Artillery, they were with no great Difficulty cut in pieces, and put to flight. And for their Three Leaders; the Lord Audley, the Black-smith, and Flammoock (as, commonly the Captains of Commotions are but half-couraged Men) suffered themselves to be taken alive. The number slain on the Rebels part, were some two thousand Men; their Army amounting (as it is said) unto the Number of Sixteen thousand. The rest were (in effect) all taken; for that the Hill, as was said, was encompassed with the King's Forces round about. On the King's Part there dyed about Three hundred; most of them shot with Arrows, which were reported to be of the length of a Taylor's Yard: So strong and mighty a Bow, the Cornish Men were said to draw.

The Victory, thus obtained, the King created divers Bannerets, as well upon Black-beath, where his Lieutenant had won the Field (whether he rode in Person to perform the said Creation) as in St George's Fields, where his own Person had been encamped. And for Matter of Liberality, he did (by open Edict) give the Goods of all the Prisoners, unto those that had taken them; either to take them in Kind, or compound for them as they could. After matter of Honour and Liberality, followed matter of Severity and Execution. The Lord Audley was led from Newgate to Tower-Hill, in a Paper Coat painted with his own Arms; the Arms reversed, the Coat torn, and he at Tower-hill beheaded. Flammoock and the Black-smith were hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tiburn; The Black-smith taking Pleasure upon the Hurdle (as it seemeth by Words that he uttered) to think that he should be Famous in aftertimes. The King was once in mind to have sent down Flammoock, and the Black-smith, to have been executed in Cornwall, for the more Terror. But, being advertised, that the Country was yet unquiet and boiling, he thought better not to irritate the People further. All the rest were pardoned by Proclamation, and to take out their Pardons under Seal, as many as would. So that, more than the Blood drawn in the Field, the King did satisfy himself with the Lives of only three Offenders, for the Expiation of this great Rebellion.

It was a strange thing, to observe the Variety and Inequality of the King's Executions and Pardons. And a Man would think it, at the first, a kind of Lottery or Chance. But, looking into 1497. it more nearly, one shall find there was Reason for it; much more perhaps, than (after so long a distance of Time) we can now discern. In the Kentish Commotion (which was but an Handfull of Men) there were executed to the number of One hundred and fifty; and, in this so mighty a Rebellion but three: Whether it were, that the King put to accompt the Men that were slain in the Field: or that he was not willing to be severe in a Popular Cause; or that the harmless behaviour of this People (that came from the West of England, to the East, without Mischief almost, or spoil of the Country) did somewhat mollify him, and move him to Compassion; or lastly, that he made a great difference between People, that did rebel upon Wantonness, and them that did rebel upon Want.

After the Cornish Men were defeated, there came from Calice to the King, an honourable Ambassage from the French King, which had arrived at Calice a Month before, and there was stayed in respect of the Troubles; but honourably entertained and defrayed.

The King, at their first coming, sent unto them, and prayed them to have Patience, till a little Smoak, that was raised in his Country, were over; which would soon be: Slighting (as his Manner was) that openly, which nevertheless he intended seriously.

This Ambassage concerned no great Affair; but only the Prolongation of Days for Payment of Monies, and some other Particulars of the Frontiers. And it was (indeed) but a wooing Ambassage; with good Respects to entertain the King in good Affection: But nothing was done or handled, to the Derogation of the King's late Treaty with the Italians.

But, during that time that the Cornish Men were in their March towards London, the King of Scotland (well advertised of all that passed, and knowing himself sure of War from England, whensoever those Stirs were appeased) neglected not his Opportunity; but thinking the King had his Hands full, entred the Frontiers of England again with an Army, and besieged the Castle of Norham in Person, with part of his Forces, sending the rest to Forrage the Country. But Fox, Bishop of Duresme (a wise Man, and one that could see through the Present, to the Future) doubting as much before, had caused his Castle of Norham to be strongly fortified, and furnished, with all kind of Munition: And had mann'd it likewise, with a very great number of tall Soldiers, more than for the proportion of the Castle; reckoning rather upon a sharp Assault, than a long Siege. And for the Country likewise, he had caused the People to withdraw their Cattel and Goods into fast Places, that were not of easie approach; and sent in Post to the Earl of Surrey (who was not far off in Yorkshire) to come in diligence to the Succour. So as the Scottish King both failed of doing good upon the Castle, and his Men had but a catching Harvest of their Spoils. And when he understood, that the Earl of Surrey was coming on with great Forces, he returned back into Scotland. The Earl finding the Castle freed, and the Enemy retired, pursued with all celerity into Scotland; hoping to have overtaken the Scottish King, and to have given him Battel; but not attaining him in time, sat down before the Castle of Aton (one of the strongest Places then esteemed, between Barwick and Edenborough) which in a small time he took. And soon after, the Scottish King retiring further into his Country, and the Weather being extraordinary foul and stormy, the Earl returned into England. So that the Expeditions on both parts were (in effect) 1497. but a Castle taken, and a Castle distressed; not answerable to the Puissance of the Forces, nor to the Heat of the Quarrel, nor to the Greatness of the Expectation.

Amongst these Troubles both Civil and External, came into England from Spain Peter Hialas, some call him Elias (surely he was the forerunner of the good Hap, that we enjoy at this Day. For, his Ambassage set the Truce between England and Scotland; the Truce drew on the Peace; the Peace the Marriage; and the Marriage the Union of the Kingdoms) a Man of great Wisdom, and (as those times were) not unlearned; sent from Ferdinando and Isabella King's of Spain unto the King, to treat a Marriage between Katherine their second Daughter, and Prince Arthur. This Treaty was by him set in a very good way, and almost brought to Perfection. But it so fell out by the way, that upon some Conference which he had with the King touching this Business, the King (who had a great Dexterity in getting suddenly into the Bosome of Ambassadors of foreign Princes, if he liked them; Inasmuch as he would many times communicate with them of his own Affairs, yea and employ them in his Service) fell into Speech and Discourse incidently, concerning the ending of the Debates and Differences with Scotland. For the King naturally did not love the barren Wars with Scotland, though he made his Profit of the Noise of them. And he wanted not in the Council of Scotland, those that would advise their King to meet him at the half way, and to give over the War with England; pretending to be good Patriots, but indeed favouring the Affairs of the King. Only his heart was too great to begin with Scotland for the Motion of Peace. On the other side, he had met with an Ally of Ferdinando of Aragon, as fit for his Turn as could be. For after that King Ferdinando had, upon assured Confidence of the Marriage to succeed, taken upon him the Person of a Fraternal Allie to the King, he would not let (in a Spanish Gravity) to counsel the King in his own Affairs. And the King on his Part not being wanting to himself, but making use of every Man's Humours, made his Advantage of this in such things as he thought either not Decent, or not Pleasant to proceed from himself; putting them off as done by the Counsel of Ferdinando. Wherefore he was content that Hialas (as in a Matter moved and advised from Hialas himself) should go into Scotland, to treat of a Concord between the two Kings. Hialas took it upon him: And coming to the Scottish King, after he had with much Art brought King James to hearken to the more safe and quiet Councils, wrote unto the King, that he hoped that Peace would with no great difficulty cement and close, if he would send some wise and temperate Counsellour of his own, that might treat of the Conditions. Whereupon the King directed Bishop Fox (who at that time was at his Castle of Norham) to confer with Hialas, and they both to treat with some Commissioners deputed from the Scottish King. The Commissioners on both Sides met. But after much Dispute upon the Articles and Conditions of Peace, propounded upon either part, they could not conclude a Peace. The chief Impediment thereof was the Demand of the King to have Perkin deliver'd into his Hands, as a Reproach to all Kings, and a Person not protected by the Law of Nations. The King of Scotland on the other side peremptorily denied so to do; saying, That he (for his part) was no Competent Judge of Perkin's Title: But that he had received him as a Suppliant, protected

The Rise of the Union of England and Scotland.

1497. tested him as a Person fled for Refuge, espoused him with his Kinswoman, and aided him with his Arms, upon the belief that he was a Prince; And therefore that he could not now with his Honour so unrip and (in a sort) put a Lye upon all that he had said and done before, as to deliver him up to his Enemies. The Bishop likewise (who had certain Proud Instructions from the King, at the least in the Front, tho' there were a pliant Clause at the Foot, that remitted all to the Bishop's Discretion, and requir'd him by no Means to break off in ill Terms) after that he had failed to obtain the Delivery of Perkin, did move a second Point of his Instructions; which was, that the Scottish King would give the King an Interview in Person at Newcastle. But this being reported to the Scottish King, his Answer was, That he meant to treat a Peace, and not to go a begging for it. The Bishop also (according to another Article of his Instructions) demanded Restitution of the Spoils taken by the Scottish, or Damages for the same. But the Scottish Commissioners answer'd, That that was but as Water spilt upon the Ground, which could not be gotten up again; and that the King's People were better able to bear the Loss, than their Master to repair it. But in the end (as Persons capable of Reason) on both Sides they made rather a kind of Recess, than a Breach of Treaty, and concluded upon a Truce for some Months following. But the King of Scotland, tho' he would not formally retract his Judgment of Perkin, wherein he had engaged himself so far; yet in his private Opinion, upon often Speech with the Englishmen, and divers other Advertisements, began to suspect him for a Counterfeit. Wherefore in a Noble fashion he call'd him unto him, and recounted the Benefits and Favours that he had done him, in making him his Ally, and in provoking a Mighty and Opulent King by an Offensive War in his Quarrel, for the space of two Years together. Nay more, that he had refused an Honourable Peace, whereof he had a fair Offer, if he would have deliver'd him; and that to keep his Promise with him, he had deeply offended both his Nobles and People, whom he might not hold in any long Discontent. And therefore requir'd him to think of his own Fortunes, and to choose out some fitter place for his Exile: Telling him withal, that he could not say, but the English had forsaken him before the Scottish; for that upon two several Trials, none had declar'd themselves on his Side. But nevertheless he would make good what he said to him at his first Receiving; which was, That he should not repent him, for putting himself into his hands; For that he would not cast him off, but help him with Shipping and means to Transport him where he should Desire. Perkin, not descending at all from his Stage-like Greatness, answer'd the King in few words, That he saw his time was not yet come; But whatsoever his Fortunes were, he should both think and speak Honour of the King. Taking his leave, he would not think on Flanders, doubting it was but hollow Ground for him, since the Treaty of the Arch-Duke concluded the Year before; but took his Lady, and such Followers as would not leave him, and sail'd over into Ireland (f).

This Twelfth year of the King, a little before this time, Pope Alexander (who loved best those Princes that were furthest off, and with whom he had least to do) taking very thankfully the King's late entrance into League, for the Defence of Italy, did remunerate him with an Hal-low'd Sword, and Cap of Maintenance sent by his Nuncio. Pope Innocent had done the like, with a consecrated Sword. For the King appointed the Mayor and his Brethren to meet the Pope's Orator at London Bridge, and all the Streets between the Bridge-foot and the Palace of Paul's (where the King then lay) were garnish'd with the Citizens, standing in their Liveries. And the Morrow after (being All-Hallow's Day) the King, attended with many of his Prelates, Nobles, and Principal Courtiers, went in Procession to Paul's, and the Cap and Sword were born before him. And after the Procession, the King himself remaining seated in the Quire, the Lord Archbishop upon the Greece of the Quire, made a long Oration, setting forth the Greatness and Eminency of that Honour, which the Pope (in these Ornaments and Ensigns of Benediction) had done the King; and how rarely, and upon what high Deserts they used to be bestow'd. And then recited the King's principal Acts and Merits, which had made him appear worthy in the Eyes of his Holiness of this great Honour.

All this while the Rebellion of Cornwall (whereof we have spoken) seem'd to have no relation to Perkin; save that perhaps Perkin's Proclamation had stricken upon the right Vein, in promising to lay down Exactions and Payments, and so had made them now and then have a Kind thought on Perkin. But now these Bubbles by much stirring began to meet, as they use to do upon the top of Water. The King's Lenity (by that time the Cornish Rebels, who were taken and pardon'd, and (as it was said) many of them sold by them that had taken them, for Twelve-Pence and Two Shillings apiece, were come down into their Country) had rather imbolden'd them, than reclaim'd them. Infomuch, as they stuck not to say to their Neighbours and Country-men, That the King did well to Pardon them, for that he knew he should leave few Subjects in England, if he hang'd all that were of their Mind: And began whetting and inciting one another to renew the Commotion. Some of the subtlest of them, hearing of Perkins being in Ireland, found means to send to him to let him know, that if he would come over to them, they would serve him.

When Perkin heard this News, he began to take heart again, and advis'd upon it with his Council which were principally three; Herne a Mercer, that fled for Debt; Skelton a Taylor, and Astley a Scrivener: for Secretary Friem was gone. These told him that he was mightily overseen, both when he went into Kent, and when he went into Scotland: The one being a Place so near London, and under the King's Nose; and the other, a Nation so distast'd with the People of England, that if they had lov'd him never so well, yet they would never have taken his part in that Company. But if he had been so happy as to have been in Cornwall at the first when the People began to take Arms there, he had been crown'd at Westminster before this time. For, these Kings (as he had now Experience) would sell poor Princes for Shoes: But he must rely wholly upon People; and therefore advis'd him to Sail over with all possible speed into Cornwall. Which, accordingly he did; ha-

(f) He arriv'd at Cork the 26th of July; where some out of Affection, others for Desire of Change flock'd to him; among whom, 'tis said, was Maurice Earl of Desmond. The Mayor and Citizens of Waterford notify'd his Arrival to the King, and as they had bravely defended themselves against Simms's Adherents, so they did the same now against Perkins; for which they were taken into the King's especial Favour. Sir J. W. Cap. XIII.

1497. ving in his Company four small Barks, with some Sixscore or Sevenfcore fighting Men. (g) He arriv'd in September at Whitland-Bay, and forthwith came to Bodmin, the Blacksmith's Town: where there assembled unto him to the number of Three Thousand Men of the rude People. There he set forth a New Proclamation, stroaking the People with fair Promises, and humouring them with Invectives against the King and his Government. And, as it fareth with Smoke, that never loseth it self till it be at the highest; he did now before his end raise his Stile, intituling himself no more Richard Duke of York, but Richard the IVth, King of England. His Council advised him by all means, to make himself Master of some good walled Town; as well to make his Men find the Sweetness of rich Spoils, and to allure to him all loose and lost People, by like hopes of Booty; as to be a sure Retreat to his Forces, in case they should have any ill Day, or unlucky Chance in the Field. Wherefore they took heart to them, and went on, and besieged the City of Exeter, the principal Town for Strength and Wealth in those Parts.

When they were come before Exeter, they forbore to use any Force at the first; but made continual Shouts and Out-cries, to terrifie the Inhabitants. They did likewise in divers places Call and Talk to them from under the Walls, to joyn with them, and be of their Party; telling them, That the King would make them another London, if they would be the first Town that should Acknowledge him. But they had not the Wit to send to them, in any orderly fashion, Agents or Chosen Men to tempt them, and to treat with them. The Citizens on their part shew'd themselves Stout and Loyal Subjects. Neither was there so much as any Tumult or Division amongst them: but all prepar'd themselves for a Valiant Defence, and making good the Town. For well they saw that the Rebels were of no such Number or Power, that they needed to fear them as yet: and well they hoped, that before their Numbers encreased, the King's Succours would come in. And, howsoever, they thought it the extremest of Evils, to put themselves at the Mercy of those hungry and disorderly People. Wherefore letting all things in good Order within the Town, they nevertheless let down with Cords, from several parts of the Walls privily, several Messengers (that, if one came to Mischance, another might pass on) which should advertise the King of the State of the Town, and implore his Aid. Perkin also doubted that Succours would come ere long; and therefore resolved to use his utmost Force to assault the Town: And for that purpose, having mounted Scaling-Ladders in divers places upon the Walls, made at the same instant an Attempt to force one of the Gates: But having no Artillery nor Engines, and finding that he could do no good by ramming with Logs of Timber, nor by the use of Iron Bars and Iron Crows, and such other means at hand, he had no way left him but to set one of the Gates on Fire: which he did. But the Citizens, well perceiving the Danger, before the Gate could be fully consum'd, block'd up the Gate, and some space about it on the inside with Faggots and other Fuel: which they likewise set on fire, and so repuls'd Fire with Fire: And, in the mean time, raised up Rampiers of Earth, and cast up deep Trenches, to serve instead of Wall and Gate. And for the Escalades, they had so bad Success, as the Rebels were driven from the Walls, with the Loss of Two hundred Men.

The King when he heard of Perkin's Siege of Exeter, made Sport with it, and said to them that were about him, That the King of Rake-bells was kin King Landed in the West, and that he hoped now to have the honour to see him, which he could never yet do.

And it appear'd plainly to those that were about the King, that he was indeed much joy'd with the News of Perkin's being in English Ground, where he could have no Retreat by Land; thinking now that he should be cured of those privy Stitches which he had long had about his Heart, and had sometimes broken his Sleeps in the midst of all his Felicity. And to set all Mens Hearts on fire, he did by all possible means let it appear, that those, who should now do him Service to make an end of these Troubles, should be no less accepted of him, than he that came upon the Eleventh Hour and had the whole Wages of the Day. Therefore now (like the end of a Play) a great Number came upon the Stage at once. He sent the Lord Chamberlain and the Lord Brook, and Sir Rice ap Thomas, with expedite Forces to speed to Exeter, to the Rescue of the Town, and to spread the Fame of his own following in Person with a Royal Army. The Earl of Devonshire and his Son, with the Caroes, and the Fulfordes, and other principal Persons of Devonshire (uncall'd from the Court, but hearing that the King's Heart was so much bent upon this Service) made hast with Troops, that they had raised, to be the first that should succour the City of Exeter, and prevent the King's Succours. The Duke of Buckingham likewise, with many Brave Gentlemen, put themselves in Arms, not staying either the King's or the Lord Chamberlain's coming on, but making a Body of Forces of themselves, the more to indear their Merit; signifying to the King their Readiness, and desiring to know his Pleasure. So that according to the Proverb, In the coming down, every Saint did help.

Perkin hearing this Thunder of Arms and Preparations against him from so many Parts, raised his Siege, and march'd to Taunton; beginning already to Squint one Eye upon the Crown, and another upon the Sanctuary: Tho' the Cornishmen were become, like Metal often fir'd and quench'd, churlish, and that would sooner break than bow; Swearing and Vowing not to leave him, till the uttermost drop of their Blood were spilt. He was at his rising from Exeter between Six and Seven thousand Strong, many having come unto him after he was set before Exeter, upon Fame of so great an Enterprize, and to partake of the Spoil; Tho' upon the raising of his Siege, some did slip away. When he was come near Taunton, he dissembled all Fear, and seemed all the Day to use Diligence in preparing all things ready to fight. But about Midnight, he fled with Threescore Horse to Bewley in the New-Forrest, where he and divers of his Company registred themselves Sanctuary-Men, leaving his Cornish-Men to the four Winds: But yet thereby easing them of their Vow, and using his wonted Compassion, Not to be by when his Subjects blood should be spilt. The King, as soon as he heard of Perkin's Flight, sent presently Five hundred Horse to pursue and apprehend him, before he should get either to the Sea, or to that same little Island, call'd a Sanctuary. But they came too late for the latter of these. Therefore

1497. all they could do, was to beset the Sanctuary, and to maintain a strong Watch about it, till the King's Pleasure were further known. As for the rest of the Rebels, they (being destituted of their Head) without Stroke stricken, submitted themselves unto the King's Mercy. And the King, who commonly drew Blood (as Physicians do) rather to save Life than to spill it, and was never Cruel when he was Secure; now he saw the Danger was past, pardon'd them all in the end, except some few desperate Persons which he reserv'd to be Executed, the better to set off his Mercy towards the rest. There were also sent with all speed some Horse to St. Michael's

The Lady Mount in Cornwall, where the Lady Katherine Gordon was left by her Husband, whom in all Fortunes she entirely loved; adding the Vertues of a Wife to the Vertues of her Sex. The King sent in the greater Diligence, not knowing whether she might be with Child; whereby the Business would not have ended in Perkin's Person. When she was brought to the King, it was commonly said, that the King receiv'd her not only with Compassion, but with Affection; Pity giving more Impression to her excellent Beauty. Wherefore comforting her (to serve as well his Eye as his Fame) he sent her to his Queen to remain with her; giving her very Honourable Allowance for the Support of her Estate: which she enjoy'd both during the King's Life and many Years after. The Name of the White-Rose (which had been given to her Husband's False Title) was continued in common Speech to her true Beauty.

The King went forwards on his Journey, and made a joyful entrance into Exeter, where he gave the Citizens great Commendations and Thanks; and taking the Sword he wore, from his Side, he gave it to the Mayor, and commanded it should be ever after carried before him. There also he caused to be executed some of the Ring-leaders of the Cornish-men, in Sacrifice to the Citizens, whom they had put in fear, and Trouble. At Exeter the King consulted with his Council, whether he should offer Life to Perkin if he would quit the Sanctuary, and voluntarily submit himself. The Council were divided in Opinion. Some advis'd the King to take him out of Sanctuary perforce, and to put him to Death, as in a Case of Necessity, which in it self dispenseth with consecrated Places and Things.

Divers Opinions of what was to be done with Perkin.

Wherein they doubted not also, but the King should find the Pope tractable to ratify his Deed, either by Declaration, or (at least) by Indulgence. Others were of Opinion (since all was now safe, and no further Hurt could be done) that it was not worth the exposing of the King to new Scandal and Envy. A third sort fell upon the Opinion that it was not possible for the King ever, either to satisfy the World well touching the Imposture, or to learn out the bottom of the Conspiracy, except by Promise of Life and Pardon, and other fair Means, he should get Perkin into his Hands. But they did all in their Preambles much bemoan the King's Case, with a kind of Indignation at his Fortune, That a Prince of his High Wisdom and Vertue, should have been so long, and so oft exercis'd and vex'd with Idols. But the King said, that it was the Vexation of God Almighty himself, to be vexed with Idols, and therefore that that was not to trouble any of his Friends. And that for himself, he always despis'd them; but was griev'd that they had put his People to such Trouble and Misery. But (in Conclusion) he lean'd to the third Opinion, and so sent some to deal with Perkin. Who seeing himself Prisoner, and destitute of all Hopes, having try'd Princes and People, Great and Small, and found all either False, Faint, or Unfortunate, did gladly accept of the Condition. The King did also (while he was at Exeter) appoint the Lord Darcy and others, Commissioners, for the Fining of all such as were of any Value, and had any Hand or partaking in the Aid or Comfort of Perkin or the Cornish-men, either in the Field or in the Flight.

These Commissioners proceeded with such Strictness and Severity, as did much obscure the King's Mercy in sparing of Blood, with the bleeding of so much Treasure. Perkin was brought unto the King's Court, but not to the King's Presence; tho' the King (to satisfy his Curiosity) saw him sometimes out of a Window, or in Passage. He was in shew at Liberty, but guarded with all Care and Watch that was possible, and willed to follow the King to London. But from his first Appearance upon the Stage, in his new Person of a Sycophant or Juggler, instead of his former Person of a Prince, all Men may think how he was expos'd to the Derision, not only of the Courtiers, but also of the Common People, who flock'd about him as he went along; that one might know afar off where the Owl was by the Flight of Birds. Some Mocking, some Wondring, some Cursing, some prying and picking Matter out of his Countenance and Gesture to Talk of. So that the false Honour and Respects which he had so long enjoy'd, was plentifully repay'd in Scorn and Contempt. As soon as he was come to London, the King gave also the City the Solace of this May-Game. For he was convey'd leisurely on Horseback (but not in any Ignominious fashion) through Chesepside and Cornwall to the Tower; and from thence back again unto Westminster, with the Churm of a thousand Taunts and Reproaches. But to amend the Show, there follow'd a little distance of Perkin, an inward Councillor of his, one that had been Serjeant-Farrier to the King. This Fellow when Perkin took Sanctuary, chose rather to take an Holy-Habit than an Holy-Place, and clad himself like an Hermit, and in that Weed wander'd about the Country till he was discover'd and taken. But this Man was bound Hand and Foot upon the Horse, and came not back with Perkin, but was left at the Tower, and within few Days after Executed. Soon after, now that Perkin could tell better what himself was, he was diligently Examined; and after his Confession taken, an Extract was made of such Parts of them, as were thought fit to be divulg'd, which was Printed and dispers'd Abroad. Wherein the King did himself no Right. For as there was a laboured Tale of Particulars, of Perkin's Father, and Mother, and Grandfire, and Grandmother, and Uncles, and Cosens, by Names and Surnames, and from what places he Travell'd up and down; so there was little or nothing to purpose of any thing concerning his Designs, or any Practices that had been held with him; nor the Dutches of Burgundy her self (that all the World did take knowledge of, as the Person that had put Life and Being into the whole Business) so much as nam'd or pointed at. So that Men missing of that they look'd for, look'd about for they knew not what, and were in more doubt than before. But the King chose rather not to satisfy, than to kindle Coals. At that time also it did not appear by any new Examinations or Commitments, that any other Person of Quality was Discover'd or Appeach'd, tho' the King's Closeness made that a Doubt-Dormant.

About this time, a great Fire in the Night-time suddenly began at the King's Palace of Shyne, near unto the King's own Lodgings, where-

Somewhat before this time also there fell out a memorable Accident: There was one Sebastian Gabato, a Venetian, dwelling in Bristol, a Man seen and expert in Cosmography and Navigation. This Man seeing the Success, and emulating perhaps the Enterprize of Christopher Columbus in that fortunate Discovery towards the Southwest, which had been by him made some Six Years before; conceited with himself, that Lands might likewise be discover'd towards the Northwest.

And surely it may be he had more firm and pregnant Conjectures of it, than Columbus had of this at the first. For the two great Islands of the Old and New World, being (in the shape and making of them) broad towards the North, and pointed towards the South; it is likely, that the Discovery first began where the Lands did nearest meet. And there had been before that time a Discovery of some Lands, which they took to be Islands, and were indeed the Continent of America towards the Northwest. And it may be, that some Relation of this Nature coming afterwards to the Knowledge of Columbus and by him suppress'd, (desirous rather to make his Enterprize the Child of his Science and Fortune, than the Follower of a former Discovery) did give him better assurance, that all was not Sea, from the West of Europe and Africa unto Asia, than either Seneca's Prophecy, or Plato's Antiquities, or the Nature of the Tides, and Landwinds, and the like, which were the Conjectures that were given out, whereupon he should have rely'd. Tho' I am not ignorant that it was likewise laid unto the casual and wind-beaten Discovery (a little before) of a Spanish Pilot, who died in the House of Columbus. But this Gabato bearing the King in hand, that he would find out an Island endued with rich Commodities, procur'd him to Man and Victual a Ship at Bristol, for the Discovery of that Island; with whom ventur'd also three small Ships of London-Merchants, fraught with some gross and slight Wares, fit for Commerce with barbarous People. He sail'd (as he affirm'd at his Return, and made a Card thereof) very far Westwards, with a Quarter of the North, on the North-side of Tierra de Labrador, until he came to the Latitude of Sixty seven Degrees and an half, finding the Seas still open. It is certain also, that the King's Fortune had a tender of that great Empire of the West-Indies. Neither was it a Refusal on the King's part, but a Delay by Accident, that put by so great an Acquest. For Christopher Columbus refused by the King of Portugal (who would not embrace at once both East and West) employ'd his Brother Bartholomew Columbus unto King Henry, to Negotiate for his Discovery. And it so fortun'd, that he was taken by Pirates at Sea; by which accidental Impediment he was long ere he came to the King. So long, that before he had obtain'd a Capitulation with the King for his Brother; the Enterprize by him was Achiev'd, and so the West-Indies by Providence were then reserv'd for the Crown of Castile. Yet this sharpen'd the King so, that not only in this Voyage, but again in the 16th Year of his Reign, and likewise in the 18th thereof, he granted forth new Commissions, for the Discovery and Investing of unknown Lands.

An Accident Trivial in itself, great in Effect.

In this Fourteenth Year also (by God's wonderful Providence, that boweth things unto his Will, and hangeth great Weights upon small Wyers) there fell out a trifling and untoward

Accident, that drew on great and happy Effects. 1498.

During the Truce with Scotland, there were certain Scottish Young Gentlemen that came into Norham Town, and there made merry with some of the English of the Town. And having little to do, went sometimes forth, and would stand looking upon the Castle. Some of the Garrison of the Castle, observing this their doing twice or thrice, and having not their Minds purg'd of the late ill Blood of Hostility, either suspected them, or quarrell'd them for Spies. Whereupon they fell at ill Words, and from Words to Blows; so that many were wounded of either Side, and the Scottish-men (being Strangers in the Town) had the worst. In so much as some of them were Slain, and the rest made haste Home. The Matter being complain'd on, and often debated before the Wardens of the Marches of both Sides, and no good Order taken, the King of Scotland took it to himself, and being much kindled, sent a Herald to the King to make Protestation, That if Reparation were not done, according to the Conditions of the Truce, his King did denounce War. The King (who had often try'd Fortune, and was inclin'd to Peace) made Answer, 'That what had been done, was utterly against his Will, and without his Privy. But if the Garrison-Souldiers had been in fault, he would see them punish'd, and the Truce in all Points to be preserv'd. But this Answer seem'd to the Scottish King but a Delay, to make the Complaint breath out with time; and therefore it did rather exasperate him, than satisfy him. Bishop Fox, understanding from the King, that the Scottish King was still Discontent and Impatient, being troubled that the Occasion of breaking of the Truce should grow from his Men, sent many humble and deprecatory Letters to the Scottish King to appease him. Whereupon King James, mollify'd by the Bishop's Submiss and Eloquent Letters, wrote back unto him, 'That tho' he were in part moved by his Letters, yet he should not be fully satisfied, except he spake with him; as well about the compounding of the present Differences, as about other Matters, that might concern the good of both Kingdoms. The Bishop advising first with the King, took his Journey for Scotland. The meeting was at Melrose, an Abbey of the Cistercians, where the King then abode. The King first roundly utter'd unto the Bishop his Offence conceiv'd for the insolent Breach of Truce, by his Men of Norham-Castle. Whereunto Bishop Fox made such an humble and smooth Answer, as it was like Oyl into the Wound, whereby it began to heal. And this was done in the Presence of the King and his Council. After, the King spake with the Bishop apart, and open'd himself unto him, saying, 'That these temporary Truces and Peaces were soon made, and soon broken: But that he desir'd a straiter Amity with the King of England, discovering his Mind; That if the King would give him in Marriage the Lady Margaret, his Eldest Daughter, that indeed might be a Knot indissoluble. That he knew well what Place and Authority the Bishop deservedly had with his Master. Therefore, if he would take the Business to heart, and deal in it effectually, he doubted not but it would succeed well. The Bishop answer'd soberly, 'That he thought himself rather happy, than worthy, to be an Instrument in such a Matter; but would do his best Endeavour. Wherefore the Bishop returning to the King, and giving Account what had passed, and finding the King more than well-disposed in it, gave the King Advice; First, to proceed

1499. proceed to a Conclusion of Peace, and then to go on with the Treaty of Marriage, by degrees. Hereupon a Peace was concluded, which was published a little before Christmas, in the Fourteenth Year of the King's Reign, to continue for both the Kings Lives, and the Over-liver of them, and a year after. In this Peace there was an Article contained, that no English Man should enter into Scotland, and no Scottish Man into England, without Letters Commendatory from the Kings of either Nation. This at the first Sight might seem a Means to continue a Strangeness between the Nations; but it was done, to lock in the Borderers.

The Kings
third Son Edmund is born and dyes.

This Year there was also born to the King a third Son, who was Christened by the Name of Edmund, and shortly after dyed. And much about the same time came News of the Death of Charles the French King; For whom there were celebrated Solemn and Princely Obsequies.

It was not long, but Perkin (who was made of Quick-silver, which is hard to hold or imprison) began to stir. For deceiving his Keepers, he took him to his Heels, and made speed to the Sea Coasts. But presently all Corners were laid for him, and such diligent Pursuit and Search made, as he was fain to turn back, and get him to the House of Bethleem, called the Priory of Sbyne, (which had the privilege of Sanctuary) and put himself into the Hands of the Prior of that Monastery. The Prior was thought an Holy Man, and much revered in those Days. He came to the King, and besought the King for Perkin's Life only; leaving him otherwise to the King's Discretion. Many about the King were again more hot than ever, to have the King to take him forth, and hang him. But the King (that had an high Stomack, and could not hate any that he despised) bid, Take him forth, and let the Knave in the Stocks. And so promising the Prior his Life, he caused him to be brought forth. And within two or three Days after, * upon a Scaffold, set up in the Palace Court at Westminster, he was Fettered and set in the Stocks, for the whole Day. And the next Day after, the like was done by him at the Cross in Cheap-side, and in both Places he read his Confession, of which we made mention before; and was from Cheap-side, conveyed and laid up in the Tower. Notwithstanding all this, the King was (as was partly touch'd before) grown to be such a Partner with Fortune, as no Body could tell what Actions the one, and what the other owned. For it was believed generally, that Perkin was betrayed, and that this Escape was not without the King's Privy, who had him all the time of his Flight in a Line; and that the King did this to pick a Quarrel with him to put him to Death, and to be rid of him at once. But this is not probable. For that the same Instruments who observed him in his Flight, might have kept him from getting into Sanctuary.

But it was ordained, that this Winding Ivy of a Plantagenet, should kill the true Tree it self. For Perkin, after he had been a while in the Tower, began to insinuate himself into the Favour and kindness of his Keepers, Servants to the Lieutenant of the Tower, Sir John Digby, being four in Number; Strangways, Blewet, Altwood, and Long-Roger. These Varlets, with Mountains of Promises, he sought to corrupt, to obtain his Escape. But knowing well, that his own Fortunes were made so contemptible, as he could feed no Man's Hopes (and by hopes he must Work, for Rewards he had none) he had contrived with himself a vast and Tragical Plot; which was, to draw into his Company Edward Plantagenet Earl of Warwick, then Prisoner in the Tower; whom the weary Life of a long Imprisonment, and the often and renewing Fears of being put to Death, had softened to take any impression of Counsel for his Liberty. This young Prince he thought these Servants would look upon, though not upon himself. And therefore after that by some Message by one or two of them, he had tasted of the Earl's Consent; it was agreed, that these four should murder their Master the Lieutenant, secretly in the Night, and make their best of such Money and portable Goods of his, as they should find ready at Hand, and get the Keys of the Tower, and presently let forth Perkin and the Earl. But this Conspiracy was revealed in time, before it could be executed. And in this again the Opinion of the King's great Wisdom did surcharge him with a Sinister Fame, that Perkin was but his Bait, to entrap the Earl of Warwick. And in the very instant while this Conspiracy was in working (as if that also had been the King's industry) it was fatal, that there should break forth a Counterfeit Earl of Warwick, a Cordwainer's Son, whose Name was * Ralph Wilford; a young Man, taught and set on by an Augustine Friar, called Pairiawck. They both from the parts of Suffolk, came forwards into Kent where they did not only privily and underhand give out, that this Wilford was the true Earl of Warwick, but also the Friar finding some light Credence in the People, took the Boldness in the Pulpit to declare as much, and to incite the People to come in to his Aid. Whereupon they were both presently apprehended, and the young Fellow executed, * and the Friar condemned to perpetual Imprisonment. This also happening so opportunely, to represent the danger to the King's Estate, from the Earl of Warwick, and thereby to colour the King's Severity that followed; together with the Madness of the Friar, so vainly and desperately to divulge a Treason, before it had gotten any manner of Strength; and the saving of the Friar's Life, which nevertheless was (indeed) but the Privilege of his Order; and the Pity in the common People (which if it run in a strong Stream, doth ever cast up Scandal and Envy) made it generally rather talked, than believed, that all was but the King's device. But howsoever it were, hereupon Perkin (that had offended against Grace now the third Time) was at the last proceeded with, and by Commissioners of Oyer and Determiner, arraigned at Westminster, * upon divers Treasons committed and perpetrated after his coming on Land within this Kingdom (for so the Judges advised, for that he was a Forreigner) and condemned, and a few days after executed at Tyburn. Where he did again openly read his Confession, and take it upon his Death to be true. This was the end of this little Cockatrice of a King, that was able to destroy those that did not espy him first. It was one of the longest Plays of that kind, that hath been in Memory; and might perhaps have had another End, if he had not met with a King both Wise, Stout, and Fortunate.

As for Perkin's three Counsellors, they had registered themselves Sanctuary-Men when their Master did. And whether upon Pardon obtained, or continuance within the Privilege, they came not to be proceeded with.

And soon after were likewise condemned eight other Persons, about the Tower-Conspiracy, whereof four were the Lieutenant's Men. But of those Eight but two * The 21st were executed. And immediately after * was of Novemb. arraigned before the Earl of Oxford (then for the time High Steward of England) the poor Prince the Earl of Warwick; not for the Attempt to escape simply (for that was not acted; And besides, the Imprisonment not being for Treason, the Escape by Law could not be Treason) But for Conspiring with Perkin to raise Sedition, and to destroy the King. And the Earl confessing the Inditement had Judgment, and was shortly after * beheaded on Tower-hill.

The King hated for it.

Blood not unrevenged.

|| In the beginning of May.

This was also the end not only of this Noble and Commiserable Person Edward the Earl of Warwick eldest Son to the Duke of Clarence, but likewise of the Line Male of the Plantagenets, which had flourished in great Royalty and Renown, from the time of the Famous King of England King Henry the Second. Howbeit it was a Race often dipped in their own Blood. It hath remained since only transplanted into other Names, as well of the Imperial Line, as of other Noble Houses. But it was neither Guilt of Crime, nor Reason of State, that could quench the Envy that was upon the King for this Execution. So that he thought good to export it out of the Land, and to lay it upon his new Allie Ferdinando King of Spain. For these two King's understanding one another at half a Word, so it was that there were Letters shewed out of Spain, whereby in the Passages concerning the Treaty of the Marriage, Ferdinando had written to the King in plain Terms, that he saw no Assurance of his Succession, as long as the Earl of Warwick lived; and that he was loth to send his Daughter to Troubles and Dangers. But hereby, as the King did in some part remove the Envy from himself; so he did not observe, that he did withall bring a kind of Malediction and Infausting upon the Marriage, as an ill Prognostick. Which in Event so far proved true, as both Prince Arthur enjoyed a very small Time after the Marriage, and the Lady Katherine, her self (a sad and a Religious Woman) long after, when King Henry the eighth his Resolution of a Divorce from her was first made known to her, used some Words; That she had not offended: but it was a Judgment of God, for that her former Marriage was made in Blood; meaning that of the Earl of Warwick.

This fifteenth Year of the King there was a great Plague, both in London and in divers parts of the Kingdom. Wherefore the King after often Change of Places (whether to avoid the danger of the Sickness, or to give occasion of an Interview with the Arch-Duke, or both) sail'd over || with his Queen to Calice. Upon his coming thither, the Arch-Duke sent an Honourable Ambassage unto him, as well to welcome him into those Parts, as to let him know, that (if it pleased him) he would come and do him Reverence. But it was said withal; That the King might be pleased to appoint some Place, that were out of any Walled Town or Fortrefs, for that he had denied the same upon like Occasion to the French King. And though he said, he made a great Difference between the two Kings, yet he would be

loth to give a President, that might make it after to be expected at his Hands, by another whom he trusted less. The King accepted of the Courtesie, and admitted of his Excuse, and appointed the Place to be at St. Peter's Church without Calice. But withal he did visit the Arch-Duke with Ambassadors sent from himself, which were the Lord Saint John, and the Secretary; unto whom the Arch-Duke did the Honour, as (going to Mass at Saint Omer's) to set the Lord Saint John on his right Hand, and the Secretary on his left, and so to ride between them to Church. The Day appointed for the || Interview, the King went on || with his Horse-back some distance from Saint Peter's Church, to receive the Arch-Duke. And upon their approaching, the Arch-Duke made hast to light, and offered to hold the King's Stirrop at his alighting; which the King would not permit, but descending from Horseback, they embraced with great Affection, and withdrawing into the Church to a Place prepared, they had long Conference, not only upon the Confirmation of former Treaties, and the freeing of Commerce, but upon Cross Marriages, to be had between the Duke of Tork the King's second Son, and the Arch-Duke's Daughter; and again between Charles the Arch-Duke's Son and Heir, and Mary the King's second Daughter. But these Blossoms of unripe Marriages, were but Friendly wishes, and the Airs of loving Entertainment; though one of them came afterwards to conclusion in Treaty, though not in Effect. But during the time that the two Princes conversed and communed together in the Suburbs of Calice, the Demonstrations on both sides were passing hearty and Affectionate, especially on the part of the Arch-Duke. Who (besides that he was a Prince of an excellent good Nature) being conscious to himself, how dryly the King had been used by his Counsel in the matter of Perkin, did strive by all means to recover it in the King's Affection. And having also his Ears continually beaten with the Counsels of his Father and Father-in-Law, who (in respect of their jealous hatred against the French King) did always advise the Arch-Duke to anchor himself upon the Amity of King Henry of England; was glad upon this Occasion, to put in Ure and Practice their Precepts, calling the King Patron, and Father, and Protector, (These very Words the King repeats; when he certified of the loving Behaviour of the Archduke to the City) and what else he could devise, to express his Love and observance to the King. There came also to the King the Governour of Picardy, and the Bailiff of Amiens, sent from Lewis the French King to do him Honour, and to give him Knowledge of his Victory and winning of the Dutchy of Milan. It seemeth the King was well pleased with the Honours he received from those Parts, while he was at Calice. For he did himself certify all the News and Occurrences of them in every particular, from Calice, to the Mayor and Aldermen of London, which (no doubt) made no small Talk in the City. For the King, though he could not entertain the good Will of the Citizens, as Edward the fourth did; yet by Affability and other Princely Graces, did ever make very much of them, and apply himself to them.

This Year also died John Morton, Archbishop of Canterbury, Chancellor of England, and Cardinal. He was a wise Man, and an Eloquent, but in his nature harsh, and haughty; much accepted by the King,

1500. King, but envied by the Nobility, and hated of the People. Neither was his Name left out of Perkin's Proclamation for any good will, but they would not bring him in amongst the King's Caſting-Counters, becauſe he had the Image and Superſcription upon him of the Pope, in his Honour of Cardinal. He won the King with Secrecy and Diligence, but chiefly becauſe he was his old Servant in his leſs Fortunes: And alſo for that (in his Affections) he was not without an inveterate Malice againſt the Houſe of York, under whom he had been in Trouble. He was willing alſo to take Envy from the King, more than the King was willing to put upon him. For the King cared not for Subterfuges, but would ſtand Envy, and appear in any thing that was to his Mind; which made Envy ſtill grow upon him more univerſal, but leſs daring. But in the Matter of Exactions, time did after ſhew, that the Biſhop in feeding the King's Humour, did rather temper it. He had been by Richard the Third committed (as in Cuſtody) to the Duke of Buckingham, whom he did ſecretly incite to revolt from King Richard. But after the Duke was engaged, and thought the Biſhop ſhould have been his chief Pilot in the Tempeſt, the Biſhop was gotten into the Cock-boat, and fled over beyond Seas. But whatſoever elſe was in the Man, he deſerveth a moſt happy Memory, in that he was the Principal Mean of joyn- ing the two Roses. He died of great Years, but of ſtrong Health and Powers. †

† He was ſucceeded by Henry Dean Biſhop of Salisbury.

A Jubile at Rome.

The next Year, which was the Sixteenth Year of the King, and the Year of our Lord One thouſand five hundred, was the Year of Jubile at Rome. But Pope Alexander, to ſave the Hazard and Charges of Mens Journeys to Rome, thought good to make over thoſe Graces by Exchange, to ſuch as would pay a convenient Rate, ſeeing they could not come to fetch them. For which purpoſe was ſent into England Jasper Pons, a Spaniard, the Pope's Commiſſioner, better choſen than were the Commiſſioners of Pope Leo, afterwards employed for Germany; for he carried the Buſineſs with great Wiſdom, and ſemblance of Holineſs. In ſo much as he levied great Sums of Money within this Land to the Pope's Uſe, with little or no Scandal. It was thought the King ſhared in the Money. But it appeareth by a Letter which Cardinal Adrian, the King's Penſioner, wrote to the King from Rome ſome few Years after, that this was not ſo. For this Cardinal, being to perſwade Pope Julius on the King's behalf, to expedite the Bull of Diſpenſation for the Marriage between Prince Henry and the Lady Katherine, finding the Pope difficile in granting thereof, doth uſe it as a principal Argument concerning the King's Merit towards that See, that he had touched none of thoſe Deniers, which had been levied by Pons in England. But that it might the better appear (for the Satisfaction of the common People) that this was Conſecrate Money, the ſame Nuntio brought unto the King a Brief from the Pope, wherein the King was Exhorted and Summoned to come in Perſon againſt the Turk. For that the Pope (out of the Care of an Universal Father) ſeeing almoſt under his Eyes the Succeſſes and Progrefſes of that great Enemy of the Faith, had had in the Conclave, and with the Aſſiſtance of the Ambaſſadors of forreign Princes, divers Con-ſultations about an Holy War, and a General Expedition of Chriſtian Princes againſt the Turk. Wherein it was agree'd, and thought fit, that the Hungarians, Polonians, and Bohemians ſhould make a War upon Thracia; The French and Spaniards upon Grecia; and that the Pope (willing to ſacrifice himſelf in ſo good a Cauſe) in Perſon and in Company of the King of England, the Venetians, and ſuch other States as were great in maritime Power, would ſail with a puſſant Navy through the Mediterrane unto Conſtantinople. And that to this end, his Holineſs had ſent Nuncio's to all Chriſtian Princes; as well for a Ceſſation of all Quarrels and Differences amongſt themſelves, as for ſpeedy Preparations and Contributions of Forces and Treafure for this Sacred Enterprize.

To this the King, (who underſtood well the Court of Rome) made an Answer rather Solemn, than Serious. Signifying,

"That no Prince on Earth ſhould be more forward and obedient, both by his Perſon, and by all his poſſible Forces, and Fortunes, to enter into this ſacred War, than himſelf. But that the diſtance of Place was ſuch, as no Forces that he ſhould raiſe for the Seas, could be levied or prepared, but with double the Charge, and double the Time (at the leaſt) that they might be from the other Princes, that had their Territories nearer adjoining. Beſides, that neither the Manner of his Ships (having no Gallies) nor the Experience of his Pilots and Mariners could be ſo apt for thoſe Seas, as theirs. And therefore that his Holineſs might do well to move one of thoſe other Kings, who lay fitter for the Purpoſe, to accompany him by Sea. Whereby both all things would be ſooner put in Readineſs, and with leſs Charge, and the Emulation and Diviſion of Command, which might grow between thoſe Kings of France and Spain, if they ſhould both joyn in the War by Land upon Grecia, might be wiſely avoided. And that for his Part, he would not be wanting in Aids and Contribution. Yet notwithstanding, if both theſe Kings ſhould reſuſe, rather than his Holineſs ſhould goe alone, he would wait upon him, as ſoon as he could be ready. Always provided, that he might firſt ſee all Differences of the Chriſtian Princes amongſt themſelves, fully laid down and appeaſed (as for his own Part he was in none.) And that he might have ſome good Towns upon the Coaſt in Italy put into his Hands, for the Retreat and ſafeguard of his Men.

With this Answer Jasper Pons returned, nothing at all diſcontented. And yet this Declaration of the King (as ſuperficial as it was) gave him that Reputation abroad, as he was not long after elected by the Knights of the Rhodes, Protector of their Order; All things multiplying to Honour in a Prince, that had gotten ſuch high Eſtimation for his Wiſdome and Sufficiency.

There

1501. There were these two last Years some Proceedings against Hereticks, which was rare in this King's Reign, and rather by Penances, than by Fire. The King had (though he were no good Schoolman) the Honour to convert one of them by Dispute at Canterbury.

The King converts an Heretic by Dispute.

This Year also, though the King were no more haunted with Sprites, for that by the Sprinkling partly of Blood, and partly of Water, he had chased them away; yet nevertheless he had certain Apparitions, that troubled him, still shewing themselves from one Region, which was the House of York. It came so to pass, that the Earl of Suffolk, Son to Elizabeth, eldest Sister to King Edward the Fourth, by John Duke of Suffolk, her second Husband, and Brother to John Earl of Lincoln, that was slain at Stock-field, being of an hasty and cholerick Disposition, had killed a Man in his Fury; whereupon the King gave him his Pardon. But either willing to leave a Cloud upon him, or the better to make him feel his Grace, produced him openly to plead his Pardon. This wrought in the Earl, as in a haughty Stomack it useth to doe; for the Ignominy printed deeper than the Grace, Wherefore he being discontent, fled secretly into Flanders, unto his Aunt the Dutches of Burgundy. The King startled at it. But being taught by Troubles, to use fair and timely Remedies, wrought so with him by Messages, (The Lady Margaret also growing by often failing in her Alcbymie, weary of her Experiments, and partly being a little sweetned, for that the King had not touched her name in the Confession of Perkin) that he came over again upon good Terms, and was reconciled to the King.

In † the beginning of the next Year, being the seventeenth of the King, the Lady Catherine, fourth Daughter of Ferdinando and Isabella, King and Queen of Spain, arrived in England, at Plymouth, the second of October and was married to Prince Arthur in Pauls, the fourteenth of November following. The Prince being then about fifteen Years of Age*, and the Lady about eighteen. The Manner of her receiving, the Manner of her Entry, into London ‖, and the Celebrity of the Marriage were performed* with great and true Magnificence, in regard of Cost, Shew, and Order. The chief Man that took the Care was Bishop Fox; who was not only a Grave Counsellor for War or Peace, but also a good Surveyor of Works, and a good Master of Ceremonies, and any thing else that was fit for the Active Part, belonging to the Service of Court, or State of a great King. This Marriage was almost seven Years in Treaty; which was in part caused by the Tender Years of the Marriage-couple, especially of the Prince. But the true Reason was, that these two Princes, being Princes of great Policy and profound Judgment, stood a great time looking one upon another's Fortunes, how they would go; knowing well that in the mean time, the very Treatie it self gave abroad in the World a Reputation of a strait Conjunction, and Amity between them; which served on both Sides to many Purposes, that their several Affairs required, and yet they continued still free. But in the End, when the Fortunes of both Princes did grow every Day 1501. more and more Prosperous and Assured, and that looking all about them, they saw no better Conditions, they shut it up.

The Marriage Money the Princess brought (which was turned over to the King by Act of Renunciation) was Two hundred thousand Ducats. Whereof One hundred thousand were payable ten Days after the Solemnization, and the other Hundred thousand at two Payments Annual; but part of it to be in Jewels and Plate, and a due Course set down to have them justly and indifferently prized. The Joyn-ture or Advancement of the Lady, was the third Part of the Principality of Wales, and of the Dukedom of Cornwall, and the Earldom of Chester, to be after set forth in severalty. or Dowry. And in Case She came to be Queen of England, her Advancement was left Indefinite, but thus; That it should be as great, as ever any former Queen of England had.

In all the Devices and Conceits of the Triumphs of this Marriage, there was a great deal of Astronomy. The Lady being resembled to Hesperus, and the Prince to Arcturus, and the old King Alphonfus (that was the greatest Astronomer of King's, and was Ancestor to the Lady) was brought in to be the Fortune-teller of the Match. And whosoever had those Toys in Compiling, they were not altogether Pedantical. But you may be sure that King Arthur, the Britton, and the Descent of the Lady Catherine from the House of Lancaster, was in no wise forgotten. But (as it should seem) it is not good to fetch 2d April, A. D. 1502. Fortunes from the Stars. For this young Prince (that drew upon him at that time, not only the Hopes and Affections of his Country, but the Eyes and Expectation of Forreiners) after a few Months, in the beginning of April, deceased at Ludlow Castle, where he was sent to keep his Residence and Court, as Prince of Wales. Of this Prince in respect he dyed so young, and by Reason of his Father's manner of Education, that did cast no great Lustre upon his Children, there is little particular Memory. Only thus much remaineth, that he was very studious and learned, beyond his Years, and beyond the Custom of great Princes.

He dies at Ludlow Castle.

There was a Doubt ripped up in the Times following, when the Divorce of King Henry the Eighth from the Lady Catherine did so much Busie the World, whether Arthur was bedded with his Lady or no, whereby that Matter in Fact (of Carnal Knowledge) might be made part of the Case. And it is true, that the Lady herself denied it, or at least her Council stood upon it, and would not blanch that Advantage, although the Plentitude of the Pope's Power of Dispensing was the main Question. And this Doubt was kept long open, in Respect of the two Queen's that Succeeded, Mary and Elizabeth, whose Legitimizations were Incompatible one with another, though their Succession was settled by Act of Parliament. And the Times that favoured Queen Mary's Legitimation would have it believed, that there was no Carnal Knowledge between Arthur and Katherine. Not that they King Henry's Behaviour towards his Children.

† She arrived as Stow says on the 4th of October which is not the beginning of the Year, she was married the 14th of November St. J. Ware.

* He was born according to the Lord Bacon p. 8. in September 1486 and so he must be 15 Years and 2 Months old. According to Hollinshead he was born in September 1488 and then he was but 13 Years and 2 Months. See Hol. p. 759.

1502. would seem to derogate from the Pope's absolute Power, to dispence even in that Case; but only in Point of Honour, and to make the Case more Favourable and Smooth. And the Times that favoured Queen Elizabeth's Legitimation (which were the longer, and the latter) maintained the contrary. So much there remaineth in Memory, that it was half a Year's time between the Creation of Henry Prince of Wales, and Prince Arthur's Death; which was construed to be, for to expect a full time, whereby it might appear, whether the Lady Catherine were with Child by Prince Arthur, or no. Again, the Lady herself procured a Bull, for the better Corroboration of the Marriage, with a Clause of (vel forsan cognitam) which was not in the first Bull. There was given in Evidence also, when the Cause of the Divorce was handled, a pleasant Passage, which was; That in a Morning Prince Arthur, upon his up-rising from Bed with her, called for Drink, which he was not accustomed to doe, and finding the Gentleman of his Chamber that brought him the Drink to smile at it, and to note it, he said merrily to him; That he had been in the midst of Spain, which was an hot Region, and his Journey had made him dry, and that if the other had been in so hot a Clime, he would have been drier than he. Besides, the Prince was upon the Point of Sixteen Years of Age when he died, and forward and able in Body.

The 18th of February following, Henry Duke of York was created Prince of Wales, and Earl of Chester and Flint. For the Dukedom of Cornwall devolved to him by Statute. The King also being fast handed, and loth to part with a Second Dowrie, but chiefly being Affectionate both by his Nature, and out of Politick Considerations to continue the Alliance with Spain, prevailed with the Prince (though not without some Reluctation, such as could be in those Years, for he was not twelve Years of Age) to be contracted with the Princess Katherine. The secret Providence of God ordaining that Marriage, to be the Occasion of great Events and Changes.

Prince Henry contracted to the Princess Katherine. The same Year were the Espousals of James King of Scotland, with the Lady Margaret, the King's eldest Daughter; which was done by Proxie, and published at Pauls Cross, the Five and twentieth of January, and Te Deum solemnly sung. But certain it is, that the Joy of the City thereupon shewed, by Ringing of Bells, and Bon-fires, and such other Incense of the People, was more than could be expected, in a Case of so great and fresh Enmity between the Nations; especially in London, which was far enough off from feeling any of the former Calamities of the War. And therefore might be truly attributed to a Secret Instinct and Inspiring (which many times runneth not only in the Hearts of Princes, but in the Pulse and Veins of People) touching the Happiness thereby to ensue in time to come. This Marriage was in August following consummate at Edenborough. The King bringing his Daughter as far as Colli-Wisdon on the Way, and then consigning her to the Attendance of the Earl of Northumberland; who with a great Troop of Lords and Ladies of Honour, brought her into Scotland, to the King her Husband.

This Marriage had been in Treaty by the space of almost three Years, from the time that the King of Scotland did first open his Mind to Bishop Fox. The Sum given in Marriage by the King, was Ten thousand Pounds. And the Jointure and Advancement assured by the King of Scotland, was Two thousand Pounds a Year, after King James his Death, and one thousand Pounds a Year in present, for the Lady's Allowance or Maintenance. This to be set forth in Lands, of the best and most certain Revenue. During the Treaty, it is reported, that the King remitted the Matter to his Council; And that some of the Table in the Freedom of Councillors (the King being present) did put the Case; that if God should take the King's two Sons without issue, that then the Kingdom of England would fall to the King of Scotland, which might be Prejudice to the Monarchy of England. Whereunto the King himself replied; That if that should be, Scotland would be but an Accession to England, and not England to Scotland, for that the Greater would draw the less. And that it was a safer Union for England, than that of France. This passed as an Oracle, and silenced those that moved the Question.

The same Year was fatal, as well for Deaths, as Marriages, and that with equal Temper. For the Joys and Feasts of the two Marriages, were compensated with the mournings, and Funerals of Prince Arthur (of whom we have spoken) and of Queen Elizabeth, who died in Child-bed in the Tower, † and the Child lived not long after. There dyed also that Year Sir Reginold Bray, who was noted to have had with the King the greatest Freedom of any Councillor; but it was but a Freedom, the better to set off Flattery. Yet he bare more than his just Part of Envy, for the Exactions.

At this time the King's Estate was very prosperous, secured by the Amity of Scotland, strengthened by that of Spain, cherished by that of Burgundy, all Domestick Troubles quenched, and all Noise of War (like a Thunder a far off) going upon Italy. Wherefore Nature, which many times is happily contained, and refrained by some Bands of Fortune, began to take Place in the King; carrying (as with a strong Tide) his Affections and Thoughts unto the gathering and heaping up of Treasure. And as Kings do more easily find Instruments for their Will and Humour, than for their Service and Honour; He had gotten for his Purpose, or beyond his Purpose, two Instruments, Empson and Dudley, (whom the People esteemed as his Horse-leeches and Shearers) bold Men, and careless of Fame, and took Toll of their Master's Grift. Dudley was of a good Family, Eloquent, and one that could put Hateful Business into good Language. But Empson, that was the Son of a Sieve-maker, triumphed always upon the Deed done, putting off all other Respects whatsoever. These two Persons being Lawyers in Science, and Privy Councillors in Authority (as the Corruption of the best things is the worst) turned Law and Justice into Worm-wood and Rapine. For first, their Manner was to cause divers Subjects to be Indicted of sundry Crimes, and so far forth to proceed in Form of Law; But when the Bills were found, then presently to commit them. And nevertheless not to produce them to any reasonable time to their Answer, but to suffer them to languish long in Prison, and by sundry artificial Devices and Terrours, to extort from them great Fines and Ransoms, which they termed Compositions and Mitigations.

1504. Neither did they (towards the end) observe so much as the half-Face of Justice, in proceeding by Indictment; but sent forth their Precepts to attach Men, and convent them before themselves and some others, at their private Houses, in a Court of Commission, and there used to shuffle up a Summary proceeding by Examination, without Trial of Jury; assuming to themselves there, to deal both in Pleas of the Crown, and Controversies Civil.

Then did they also use to enthrall and charge the Subjects Lands with Tenures in Capite, by finding false Offices, and thereby to Work upon them for Wardships, Liveries, Premier Seilines, and Alienations, (being the Fruits of those Tenures) refusing upon divers Pretexts and Delays, to admit Men to traverse those false Offices, according to the Law. Nay, the King's Wards after they had accomplished their full Age, could not be suffered to have Livery of their Lands, without paying excessive Fines, far exceeding all reasonable Rates. They did also vex Men with Informations of Intrusion upon scarce colourable Titles.

How Outlawries were punished.

When Men were Out-lawed in Personal Actions, they would not permit them to purchase their Charters of Pardon, except they paid great and intollerable Sums; standing upon the strict Point of Law, which upon Out-lawries giveth Forfeiture of Goods. Nay, contrary to all Law and Colour, they maintained, the King ought to have the half of Mens Lands and Rents, during the Space of full two Years, for a Pain in Case of Out-lawry. They would also ruffle with Jurors, and inforce them to find as they would direct, and (if they did not) Convent them. Imprison them, and Fine them,

These and many other Courses, fitter to be buried than repeated, they had of Preying upon the People; both like tame Hawks for their Master, and like wild Hawks for themselves; in so much as they grew to great Riches and Substance. But their principal working was upon Penall Laws, wherein they spared none, great nor small; nor considered whether the Law were possible, or impossible, in Use or Obsolete: But raked over all old and new Statutes, though many of them were made with intention rather of Terrour, than of Rigour; having ever a Rabble of Promoters, Questmongers, and leadings Jurors at their Command, so as they could have any thing found either for Fact or Valuation.

The King's Diligence to get Money.

There remaineth to this Day a Report, that the King was on a time entertained by the Earl of Oxford (that was his Principal Servant, both for War and Peace) nobly and sumptuously, at his Castle at Henningham. And at the King's going away, the Earl's Servants stood (in a seemly Manner) in their Livery Coats, with Cognifances, ranged on both sides, and made the King a Lane. The King called the Earl unto him and said; My Lord, I have heard much of your Hospitality, but I see it is greater than the Speech. These handsome Gentlemen and Yeomen, which I see on both sides of me, are sure your menial Servants. The Earl smiled, and said; It may please your Grace, that were not for mine ease. They are most of them my Retainers, that are come to do me service at such a time as this, and chiefly to see your Grace. The King started a little, and said; By my Faith (my Lord) I thank you for my good Chear, but I may not endure to have my Laws broken in my sight. My

Attorney must speak with you. And it is part of the Report, that the Earl compounded for no less than fifteen thousand Marks. And to shew further the King's extreme Diligence; I do remember to have seen long since a Book of Account of Empson's, that had the King's Hand almost to every Lease, by way of Signing, and was in some Places postilled in the Margent with the Kings Hand likewise, where was this Remembrance.

Which I do the rather mention, because it shews in the King a Nearness, but yet with a kind of Justness. So these little Sands and Grains of Gold and Silver (as it seemeth) helped not a little to make up the great Heap and Bank.

But mean while (to keep the King awake) the Earl of Suffolk having been too gay at Prince Arthur's Marriage, and sunk himself deep in Debt, had yet once more a Mind to be a Knight-Errant, and to seek Adventures in Foreign Parts. And taking his Brother with him, fled again into Flanders. That (no doubt) which gave him Confidence, was the great Murmur of the People against the King's Government. And being a Man of a light and rash Spirit, he thought every Vapour would be a Tempest. Neither wanted he some Party within the Kingdom. For the Murmur of People awakes the Discontents of Nobles, and again, that calleth up commonly some Head of Sedition. The King resorting to his wonted and tried Arts, caused Sir Robert Curson, Captain of the Castle at Hammes (being at that time beyond Sea, and therefore less likely to be wrought upon by the King) to fly from his Charge, and to fain himself a Servant of the Earl's. This Knight, having insinuated himself into the Secrets of the Earl, and finding by him upon whom chiefly he had either Hope or Hold, advertised the King thereof in great Secrecy. But nevertheless maintained his own Credit and inward Trust with the Earl. Upon whose Advertisements, the King attached William Courteney, Earl of Devonshire, his Brother-in-Law, married to the Lady Katherine, Daughter to King Edward the Fourth; William De-la-Pole, Brother to the Earl of Suffolk; Sir James Tirrel, and Sir John Windham, and some other meaner Persons, and committed them to Custody. George Lord Abergavennie, and Sir Thomas Green, were at the same time apprehended; but as upon less Suspicion, so in a freer Restraint, and were soon after delivered. The Earl of Devonshire, being interested in the Blood of York, that was rather Feared than Nocent; yet as one, that might be the Object of others Plots and Designs, remained Prisoner in the Tower, during the King's Life. William De-la-pole, was also long restrained

But for Sir James Tirre! (against whom the Blood of the Innocent Princes, Edward the Fifth, and his Brother, did still cry from under the Altar) and Sir James Tirrell John Windham, and the other meaner ones, they were attainted and executed; The two Knights beheaded. Nevertheless, to confirm the Credit of Curson (who belike had not yet done all his Feats of Activity) there was published at Paul's Cross, about the time of the said Executions, the Pope's Bull of Excommunication and Curse, against the Earl of Suffolk, and Sir Robert Curson, and some others by Name, and likewise in general against all the Abettors of the said Earl. Wherein it must be confessed, that Heaven was made too much to bow to Earth, and Religion to Policy. But soon after, Curson (when he saw time) returned into England, and with all into wonted Favour with the King, but worse Fame with the People. Upon whose Return the Earl was much dismayed, and seeing himself destitute of Hopes (the Lady Margaret also by tract of Time, and bad Success, being now become Cool in those Attempts) after some wandering in France, and Germany, and certain little Projects, no better than Squibbs of an Exiled Man, being tired out, retired again into the Protection of the Arch-Duke Philip in Flanders, who by the Death of Isabella, was at that time King of Castile, in the Right of Joan his Wife.

This Year † (being the Nineteenth of his Reign) the King called his Parliament. Wherein a Man may easily guess, how absolute the King took himself to be with his Parliament, when Dudley that was so hateful, was made Speaker of the House of Commons. In this Parliament, there were not made any Statutes memorable, touching publick Government. But those that were, had still the Stamp of the King's Wisdom and Policy.

There was a Statute made for the disannulling of all Patents of Lease, or Grant, to such as came not upon lawful Summons, to serve the King in his Wars, against the Enemies or Rebels, or that should depart without the King's Licence; with an Exception of certain Persons of the Long-robe. Providing nevertheless, that they should have the King's Wages, from their House, till their Return home again. There had been the like made for Offices, and by this Statute it was extended to Lands. But a Man may easily see by many Statutes made in this King's time, that the King thought it safest, to assist Martial Law, by Law of Parliament.

Another Statute was made, prohibiting the bringing in of Manufactures of Silk wrought by it self, or mixt with any other Thread. But it was not of Stuffs of whole piece (for that the Realm had of them no Manufacture in use at that time) but of knit-Silk, or Texture of Silk; as Ribbands, Laces, Caules, Points, and Girdles, &c. which the People of England could then well skill to make. This Law pointed at a true Principle: That where foreign Materials are but Superfluities, foreign Manufactures should be prohibited. For that will either banish the Superfluity or gain the Manufacture.

There was a Law also of Resumption of Patents of Gaols, and the Re-annexing of them to the Sherifwicks; Priviledged Officers being no less an Interruption of Justice, than priviledged Places.

There was likewise a Law to restrain the By-laws or Ordinances of Corporations, which many times were against the Prerogative of the King, the Common-law of the Realm, and the Liberty of the Subject, being Fraternities in Evil. It was therefore Provided, that they should not be put in Execution, without the Allowance of the Chancellor, Treasurer, and the two Chief-Justices, or three of them, or of the two Justices of Circuit where the Corporation was.

Another Law was (in effect) to bring in the Silver of the Realm to the Mint, in making all clipped, minished, or impayred Coins of Silver, not to be current in Payments; without giving any Remedy of Weight, but with an Exception only of a reasonable Wearing, which was nothing in respect of the Incertainty; and so (upon the Matter) to set the Mint on Work, and to give way to New Coins of Silver, which should be then minted.

There likewise was a long Statute against Vagabonds, wherein two things may be noted; the one the Dislike the Parliament had of Gaoling of them, as that which was chargeable, pestiferous, and of no open Example. The other, that in the Statutes of this King's time, (for this of the Nineteenth Years is not the only Statute of that kind) there are ever coupled, the Punishment of Vagabonds, and the Forbidding of Dice, and Cards, and unlawful Games unto Servants and mean People, and the putting down and suppressing of Ale houses, as Strings of one Root together, and as if the one were Unprofitable, without the other.

As for Riot and Retainers, there passed scarce any Parliament in this time without a Law against them, the King ever having an Eye to Might, and Multitude.

There was granted also that Parliament a Subsidy, both for the Temporality and the Clergy. And yet nevertheless, ere the Year expired, there went out Commissions for a general Benevolence, though there were no Wars; no Fears. The same Year the City gave Five thousand Marks, for Confirmation of their Liberties; a thing fitter for the Beginnings of Kings Reigns, than the latter Ends. Neither was it a small Matter, that the Mint gained upon the late Statute, by the Recoinage of Groats and Half-Groats, now Twelve-pences and Six-pences. As for Empson and Dudley's Mills, they did grind more than ever. So that it was a strange thing, to see what Golden Showrs poured down upon the King's Treasury at once. The last Payments of the Marriage-money from Spain; The Subsidy; The Benevolence; The Recoinage; The Redemption of the Cities Liberties; The Casualties. And this is the more to be marvelled at, because the King had then no Occasions at all of Wars or Troubles. He had now but one Son, and one Daughter unbetrothed. He was Wise; He was of an high Mind; He needed not to make Riches his Glory. He did excell in so many things else; save that certainly Avarice doth ever find in it self Matter of Ambition. Belike he thought to leave his Son such a Kingdom, and such a Mass of Treasure, as he might choose his Greatness where he would.

This Year † was also kept the Serjeants Feast, which was the second Call in this King's Days.

About * this time Isabella, Queen of Castile, deceased; a right Noble Lady, and an Honour to her Sex, and Times, and the Corner-stone of the Greatness of Spain, that hath followed. This Accident the King took not for News at large, but thought it had a great Relation to his own Affairs; especially in two Points. The one, for Example; the other for consequence. First, he conceived that the Case of Ferdinando of Aragon, after the Death of Queen Isabella, was † On the his own Case, after the Death of his own Queen: and the Case of Joan the Heir unto Castile, was the

1505. the Case of his own Son Prince Henry. For if both of the Kings had their Kingdoms, in the Right of their Wives, they descended to the Heirs, and did not accrew to the Husbands. And although his own Case had both Steel and Parchment, more than the other (that is to say, a Conquest in the Field, and an Act of Parliament) yet notwithstanding, that Natural Title of Descent in Blood, did (in the Imagination even of a Wife Man) breed a Doubt, that the other two were not safe nor sufficient. Wherefore he was wonderful diligent, to inquire and observe what became of the King of Arragon, in holding and continuing the Kingdom of Castile. And whether he did hold it in his own Right, or as Administrator to his Daughter; And whether he were like to hold it in Fact, or to be put out by his Son-in-Law. Secondly, he did revolve in his Mind, that the State of Christendom might by this late Accident have a Turn. For whereas before Time himself, with the Conjunction of Arragon and Castile (which then was one) and the Amity of Maximilian and Philip his Son the Arch-Duke, was far too strong a Party for France; he began to fear, that now the French King (who had great Interest in the Affections of Philip the young King of Castile) and Philip himself, now King of Castile, (who was in ill Terms with his Father in Law about the present Government of Castile) And thirdly Maximilian, Philip's Father (who was ever variable, and upon whom the surest Aim that could be taken, was that he would not be long, as he had been last before) would, all three being potent Princes, enter into some strait League and Confederation amongst themselves. Whereby though he should not be endangered, yet he should be left to the poor Amity of Arragon. And whereas he had been heretofore a kind of Arbitrer of Europe, he should now goe less, and be over-topped by so great a Conjunction. He had also (as it seems) an Inclination to marry, and bethought himself of some fit Conditions abroad. And amongst other's, he had heard of the Beauty and Vertuous Behaviour of the young Queen of Naples, the Widow of Ferdinando the younger, being then of Matronal Years of Seven and twenty. By whose Marriage he thought that the Kingdom of Naples (having been a Goal for a time between the King of Arragon, and the French King, and being but newly settled) might in some part be deposited in his Hands, who was so able to keep the Stakes. Therefore he sent in Ambassage or Message three Confident Persons; Francis Marfin, James Braybrook, and John Stile, upon two several Inquisitions rather than Negotiations. The one touching the Person and Condition of the young Queen of Naples. The other touching all particulars of Estate, that concerned the Fortunes and Intentions of Ferdinando. And because they may observe best who themselves are observed least, he sent them under colourable Pretexts; giving them Letters of Kindness and Complement from Katherine the Princess, to her Aunt, and Niece, the old and young Queen of Naples, and delivering to them also a Book of new Articles of Peace; which notwithstanding it had been delivered unto Doctor de Puebla, the Legier Ambassador of Spain here in England, to be sent; yet for that the King had been long without hearing from Spain, he thought good those Messengers, when they had been with the two Queens, should likewise pass on to the Court of Ferdinando, and take a Copy of the Book with them. The Instructions touching the Queen of Naples were so curious and exquisite, being as Articles whereby to direct a Survey, or framing a Particular of her Person, 1505. for Complexion, Favour, Feature, Stature, Health, Age, Customs, Behaviour, Conditions, and Estate, as if the King had been young, a Man would have judged him to be Amorous; but being Ancient, it ought to be Interpreted, that sure he was very Chast, for that he meant to find all things in one Woman, and so to settle his Affections, without ranging. But in this Match he was soon cooled, when he heard from his Ambassadors, that this young Queen had had a goodly Joynture in the Realm of Naples, well answered during the time of her Uncle Frederick, yea, and during the time of Lewis the French King, in whose Division her Revenue fell; but since the time that the Kingdom was in Ferdinando's Hands, all was assigned to the Army, and Garrisons there, and she received only a Pension or Exhibition out of his Coffers.

The other part of the Inquiry had a grave and diligent Return, informing the King at full of the present State of King Ferdinando. By this Report it appeared to the King, that Ferdinando did continue the Government of Castile as Administrator unto his Daughter Joan, by the Title of Queen Isabella's Will, and partly by the Custom of the Kingdom, as he pretended. And that all Mandates and Grants were expedited in the name of Joan his Daughter, and himself as Administrator, without mention of Philip, her Husband. And that King Ferdinando, howsoever he did dismiss himself of the name of King of Castile, yet meant to hold the Kingdom, without accompt, and in absolute Command.

It appeareth also, that he flattered himself with hopes, that King Philip would permit unto him the Government of Castile during his Life; which he had layed his Plot to work him unto, both by some Counsellors of his about him, which Ferdinando had at his Devotion, and chiefly by Promise, that in case Philip gave not Way unto it, he would marry some young Lady, whereby to put him by the Succession of Arragon and Granada, in case he should have a Son. And lastly, by representing unto him that the Government of the Burgundians, till Philip were by continuance in Spain made as natural of Spain, would not be endured by the Spaniards. But in all those things (though wisely laid down and considered) Ferdinando fail'd; but that Pluto was better to him, than Pallas.

In the same Report also, the Ambassadors being mean Men, and therefore the more free, did strike upon a string which was somewhat dangerous. For they declared plainly, that the People of Spain, both Nobles and Commons, were better affected unto the part of Philip (so he brought his Wife with him) than to Ferdinando; and expressed the Reason to be, because he had imposed upon them many Taxes, and Tallages, which was the King's own Case between him and his Son.

There was also in this Report a Declaration of an Overture of Marriage, which Amason the Secretary of Ferdinando had made unto the Ambassadors in great secret, between Charles Prince of Castile and Mary the King's second Daughter; assuring the King, that the Treaty of Marriage then on Foot, for the said Prince and the Daughter of France, would break; and that she the said Daughter of France should be married to Angoleme, that was the Heir Apparent of France.

There was a touch also of a speech of Marriage between Ferdinando and Madam de Foix, a Lady of the Blood of France, which afterwards indeed succeeded. But this was reported as Learned in France, and silenced in Spain.

The King by the Return of this Ambassage, which gave great light unto his Affairs, was well instructed, and prepared how to carry himself between Ferdinando King of Aragon, and Philip his Son-in-law, King of Castile; resolving with himself, to do all that in him lay to keep them at one within themselves; But howsoever that succeeded, by a moderate Carriage and bearing the Person of a Common-Friend, to lose neither of their Friendships; but yet to run a course more entire with the King of Aragon, but more laboured and officious with the King of Castile. But he was much taken with the Overture of Marriage with his Daughter Mary; both because it was the greatest Marriage of Christendom, and for that it took hold of both Allies.

But to corroborate his Alliance with Philip, the Winds gave him an Enterview. For Philip choosing the Winter-Season, the better to surprize the King of Aragon, set forth with a great Navy out of Flanders for Spain in the Month of January, the One and Twentieth Year of the King's Reign. But himself was surprized with a cruel Tempest, that scatter'd his Ships upon the several Coasts of England. And the Ship wherein the King and Queen were (with two other small Barks only) torn, and in great peril to escape the Fury of the Weather, thrust into Weymouth. King Philip himself, having not been used (as it seems) to Sea, all wearied and extream Sick, would needs land to refresh his Spirits, tho' it was against the Opinion of his Council, doubting it might breed Delay, his Occasions requiring Celerity.

The Rumour of the Arrival of a Puissant Navy upon the Coast, made the Country arm. And Sir Thomas Trenchard with Forces suddenly raised, not knowing what the Matter might be, came to Weymouth. Where understanding the Accident, he did in all Humbleness and Humanity invite the King and Queen to his House; and forthwith dispatched Posts to the Court. Soon after came Sir John Caroe likewise, with a great Troop of Men well arm'd; using the like Humbleness and Respect towards the King, when he knew the Case. King Philip doubting that they, being but Subjects, durst not let him pass away again, without the King's notice and leave, yielded to their Entreaties, to stay till they heard from the Court. The King as soon as he heard the News, commanded presently the Earl of Arundel, to go to Visit the King of Castile, and let him understand, That as he was very Sorry for his Mishap, so he was glad that he had escap'd the Danger of the Seas, and likewise of the Occasion himself had to do him Honour; and desiring him, to think himself as in his own Land; and that the King made all haist possible to come and imbrace him. The Earl came to him in great Magnificence, with a brave Troop of Three hundred Horse; and (for more State) came by Torch-Light. After he had done the King's Message, King Philip seeing how the World went, the sooner to get away, went upon speed to the King at Windsor, and his Queen follow'd by easy Journeys. The two Kings at their Meeting us'd all the Caresses, and loving Demonstrations that were possible. And the King of Castile said pleasantly to the King, That he was now punished, for that he would not come with-in his walled Town of Calice, when they met last. But the King answer'd, That Walls and Seas were nothing, where Hearts were open; and that he was here no otherwise, but to be served. After a Day or two's refreshing, the Kings entred into Speech of renewing the Treaty; The King saying, 'That tho' King Philip's Person were the 'same, yet his Fortunes and State were raised.

In which Case a Renovation of Treaty was used amongst Princes. But while these things were in handling, the King choosing a fit time, and drawing the King of Castile into a Room, where they two only were private, and laying his hand civilly upon his Arm, and changing his Countenance a little from a Countenance of Intertainment, said to him; Sir, you have been saved upon my Coast, I hope you will not suffer me to wrack upon yours. The King of Castile ask'd him, What he meant by that Speech? I mean it (saith the King) by that same Harebrain wild Fellow, my Subject, the Earl of Suffolk, who is protected in your Country, and begins to play the Fool, when all others are weary of it. The King of Castile answer'd, I had thought (Sir) your Felicity had been above those Thoughts. But if it trouble you, I will banish him. The King reply'd, Those Hornets were best in their Nest, and worst when they did fly abroad, that his Desire was, to have him delivered to him. The King of Castile herewith a little confused, and in a study, said, That can I not do with my Honour, and lest with yours; for you will be thought to have used me as a Prisoner. The King presently said, Then the Matter is at an end. For I will take that Dishonour upon me, and so your Honour is saved. The King of Castile, who had the King in great Estimation, and besides remembred where he was, and knew not what Use he might have of the King's Amity, for that himself was new in his Estate of Spain, and unsettled, both with his Father in Law, and with his People, composing his Countenance, said, Sir, you give Law to me; but so will I to you. You shall have him, but (upon your Honour) you shall not take his Life. The King embracing him, said, Agreed. Saith the King of Castile, Neither shall it dislike you, if I send to him in such a fashion as he may partly come with his own good Will. The King said, It was well thought of; and if it pleased him, he would joyn with him, in sending to the Earl a Message to that purpose. They both sent severally, and mean while they continued Feasting and Pastimes. The King being (on his part) willing to have the Earl sure before the King of Castile went; and the King of Castile being as willing to seem to be enforced. The King also with many wise and excellent Perswasions, did advise the King of Castile to be ruled by the Council of his Father in Law Ferdinando; a Prince so Prudent, so Experienced, so Fortunate. The King of Castile (who was in no very good terms with his said Father in Law) answer'd, That if his Father in Law would suffer him to govern his Kingdoms, he should govern him.

There were immediately Messengers sent from both Kings to recall the Earl of Suffolk: Who upon gentle Words used to him was soon charmed, and willing enough to return; assur'd of his Life, and hoping of his Liberty. He was brought through Flanders to Calice, and thence landed at Dover, and with sufficient Guard delivered and received at the Tower of London. Mean while King Henry (to draw out the time) continued his Feastings and Entertainments, and after he had receiv'd the King of Castile into the Fraternity of the Garter, and for a Reciprocal had his Son the Prince admitted to the Order of the Golden-Fleece, he accompany'd King Philip and his Queen to the City of London; where they were entertain'd with the greatest Magnificence and Triumph, that could be upon no greater warning. And as soon as the Earl of Suffolk had been convey'd to the Tower (which was the serious part) the Jollities had an end, and the Kings took leave. Nevertheless during their being here, they in Substance concluded Conference between K. Henry and Philip K. of Castile.

Earl of Suffolk returns.

1506. that Treaty, which the Flemings term Intercursus malus, and bears Date at Windsor; for that there be some things in it more to the Advantage of the English, than of them; especially, for that the Free-fishing of the Dutch upon the Coasts and Seas of England, granted in the Treaty of Un-
The Free-fishing of the Dutch refus'd to be Confirm'd. decimo, was not by this Treaty confirmed. All Articles that confirm former Treaties being precisely and warily limited and confirm'd to matter of Commerce only, and not otherwise.

It was observ'd, that the great Tempest which drove Philip into England, blew down the Golden-Eagle from the Spire of Paul's, and in the Fall it fell upon a Sign of the Black-Eagle, which was in Paul's Church-yard, in the Place where the School-House now standeth, and batter'd it, and brake it down. Which was a strange stooping of a Hawk upon a Fowl. This the People interpreted to be an Ominous Prognostick upon the Imperial House, which was (by Interpretation also) fulfill'd upon Philip the Emperor's Son, not only in the present Disaster of the Tempest, but in that that follow'd. For Philip arriving into Spain, and attaining the Possession of the Kingdom of Castile without Resistance, (inasmuch as Ferdinando, who had spoke so great before, was with difficulty admitted to the Speech of his Son in Law) sickned soon after, and Deceased. Yet after such time as there was an Observation by the wisest of that Court, That if he had liv'd, his Father would have gain'd upon him in that fort, as he would have govern'd his Councils and Designs, if not his Affections. By this all Spain return'd into the Power of Ferdinando in state as it was before; the rather, in regard of the Infirmary of Joan his Daughter, who loving her Husband (by whom she had many Children) dearly well, and no less belov'd of him (howsoever her Father, to make Philip ill beloved of the People of Spain, gave out that Philip us'd her not well) was unable in Strength of Mind to bear the Grief of his Decease, and fell distracted of her Wits. Of which Malady her Father was thought no ways to endeavour the Cure, the better to hold his Regal Power in Castile. So that as the Felicity of Charles VIII. was said to be a Dream; so the Adversity of Ferdinando was said likewise to be a Dream, it passed over so soon.

About this time the King was desirous to bring into the House of Lancaster Celestial Honour, and became Suitor to Pope Julius, to canonize King Henry VI. for a Saint; the rather in respect of that his famous Prediction of the King's own Assumption to the Crown. Julius referred the Matter (as the manner is) to certain Cardinals, (b) to take the Verification of his holy Acts and Miracles. But it died under the Reference. The general Opinion was that Pope Julius was too Dear, and that the King would not come to his Rates. But it is more probable, That that Pope (who was extremely jealous of the Dignity of the See of Rome, and of the Acts thereof) knowing that King Henry VI. was reputed in the World abroad but for a Simple Man, was afraid it would but diminish the Estimation of that kind of Honour, if there were not a distance kept betwixt Innocents and Saints.

The same Year likewise there proceeded a Treaty of Marriage between the King and the Lady Margaret Dutches Dowager of Savoy, only Daughter to Maximilian, and Sister to the King of Castile; a Lady Wise, and of great good

1507. Fame. This Matter had been in Speech between the two Kings at their Meeting, but was soon after resum'd; and therein was employ'd for his first Piece the King's then Chaplain, and after the great Prelate Thomas Wolsey. It was in the end concluded, with great and ample Conditions for the King, but with Promise De Futuro only. It may be the King was the rather induced unto it, for that he heard more and more of the Marriage to go on between his great Friend and Ally Ferdinando of Arragon, and Madam de Foix, whereby that King began to piece with the French King, from whom he had been always before severed. So fatal a Thing it is, for the greatest and straitest Amities of Kings, at one time or other to have a little of the Wheel. Nay, there is a further Tradition (in Spain, tho' not with us) That the King of Arragon, after he knew that the Marriage between Charles, the young Prince of Castile, and Mary the King's second Daughter went roundly on (which tho' it was first moved by the King of Arragon, yet it was afterwards wholly advanced and brought to Perfection by Maximilian, and the Friends on that Side) entred into a Jealousy, that the King did Aspire to the Government of Castilia, as Administrator during the Minority of his Son in Law; as if there should have been a Competition of Three for that Government; Ferdinando, Grandfather on the Mother's side; Maximilian, Grandfather on the Father's side; and King Henry, Father in Law to the young Prince. Certainly, it is not unlike, but the King's Government (carrying the young Prince with him) would have been perhaps more welcome to the Spaniards, than that of the other Two. For the Nobility of Castilia, that so lately put out the King of Arragon, in favour of King Philip, and had discover'd themselves so far, could not be but in a secret Distrust and Distaste of that King. And as for Maximilian, upon twenty respects he could not have been the Man. But this Purpose of the King's seemeth to me (considering the King's safe Courses, never found to be enterprising or adventurous) not greatly probable, except he should have had a Desire to breath warmer, because he had ill Lungs. This Marriage with Margaret was protracted from time to time, in respect of the Infirmary of the King, who now in the Two and twentieth of his Reign began to be troubled with the Gout. But the Defluxion taking also into his Breast, wasted his Lungs, so that thrice in a Year (in a kind of Return, and especially in the Spring,) he had great Fits and Labours of the Typhick. Nevertheless, he continued to intend Business with as great Diligence, as before in his Health. Yet so, as upon this warning, he did likewise now more seriously think of the World to come, and of making himself a Saint, as well as King Henry the Sixth, by Treasure better employ'd, than to be given to Pope Julius. For this Year he gave greater Alms than accustomed, and discharged all Prisoners about the City, that lay for Fees or Debts under Forty Shillings. He did also make haste with Religious Foundations; and in the Year following (which was the Three and twentieth) finish'd that of the Savoy. And hearing also of the bitter Cries of his People against the Oppressions of Dudley and Empson, and their Complices; partly by Devout Persons about him, and partly by Publick Sermons (the Preachers

(b) The Pope by his Bull committed the Examination of this Matter to the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of London, Winchester and Durham; The Bull is in the Collomais Library. Sir J. W. An. Hen. VII. Cap. XX.

1508. doing their Duty therein) He was touch'd with great Remorse for the same. Nevertheless, Empson and Dudley, tho' they could not but hear of these Scruples in the King's Conscience; yet as if the King's Soul and his Money were in several Offices, that the One was not to intermeddle with the Other, went on with as great Rage as ever. For the same Three and twentieth Year was there a sharp Prosecution against Sir William Capel now

Sir William Capel Fin'd a second time. He was Mayor, An. 1504.

He was Mayor in the Year 1505.

Sir Lawrence Ailmer was Mayor the year 1507. * Hol. writes, that they were imprison'd in the King's Bench till they had paid 1400 l. Fine, p. 796. K. Henry left behind him at his Death 180000 pounds Sterl.

the second time; and this was for Matters of Misgovernment in his Mayoralty. The great Matter being, that in some Payments he had taken Knowledge of False Moneys, and did not his Diligence to examine and beat it out who were the Offenders. For this and some other things laid to his Charge, he was condemn'd to pay Two thousand Pounds; and being a Man of Stomach, and harden'd by his former Troubles, refused to pay a Mite; and he-like used some untoward Speeches of the Proceedings, for which he was sent to the Tower, and there remain'd till the King's Death. Knesworth likewise, that had been lately Mayor of London, and both his Sheriffs, were for Abuses in their Offices, question'd, and imprison'd, and deliver'd upon One Thousand four Hundred Pounds paid. Hawit, an Alderman of London, was put in Trouble, and died with Thought and Anguish before his Business came to an End. Sir Lawrence Ailmer, who had likewise been Mayor of London, and his two Sheriffs, were put to the Fine of One Thousand Pounds. * And Sir Lawrence, for refusing to make Payment, was committed to Prison, where he stay'd till Empson himself was committed in his Place.

It is no Marvel (if the Faults were so light, and the Rates so heavy) that the King's Treasure of Store that he left at his Death, most of it in secret Places under his own Key and keeping, at Richmond, amounted (as by Tradition it is reported to have done) unto the Sum of near Eighteen hundred Thousand Pounds Sterling; a huge mass of Money, even for these times.

The last Act of State that concluded this King's Temporal Felicity, was the Conclusion of a Glorious Match between his Daughter Mary, and Charles Prince of Castile, afterwards the great Emperor, both being of tender Years. Which Treaty was perfected by Bishop Fox, and other his Commissioners at Calice, the Year before the King's Death. In which Alliance, it seemeth he himself took so high Contentment, as in a Letter which he wrote thereupon to the City of London (commanding all possible Demonstrations of Joy to be made for the same) he expresseth himself, as if he thought he had built a Wall of Bricks about his Kingdom. When he had for his Sons in Law, a King of Scotland, and a Prince of Castile and Burgundy. So as now there was nothing to be added to this great King's Felicity, being at the top of all worldly Bliss, (in regard of the high Marriages of his Children, his great Renown throughout Europe, and his scarce credible Riches, and the perpetual Constancy of his prosperous Successes) but an opportune Death, to withdraw him from any Future blow of Fortune. Which certainly (in regard of the great Hatred of his People, and the Title of his Son, being then come to Eighteen Years of Age, and being a bold Prince, and liberal, and that gained upon the People by his very Aspect and Presence) had not been impossible to have come upon him.

To Crown also the last Year of his Reign as well as his first, he did an Act of Piety, Rare and worthy to be taken into Imitation. For he granted forth a General Pardon, as expecting a second Coronation in a better Kingdom. He did also declare in his Will, that his Mind was, that Restitution should be made of those Sums, which had been unjustly taken by his Officers.

And thus this Solomon of England (for Solomon also was too heavy upon his People in Exactions) having lived Two and fifty Years, and thereof reigned Three and twenty Years, and Eight Months, being in perfect Memory, and in a most blessed Mind, in a great Calm of a Consuming Sickness pass'd to a better World, the Two and twentieth of April, 1508. † at his Palace of Richmond, which himself had Built.

" This King (to speak of him in Terms equal A Deserving) was one of the best sort of Wonders; a Wonder for Wisemen. He had Parts (both in his Vertues, and his Fortune) not so fit for a Common-place, as for Observation. Certainly he was Religious, both in his Affection and Observance. But as he could see clear (for those times) through Superstition, so he would be blinded (now and then) by Human Policy. He advanced Church-men; he was tender in the Privilege of Sanctuaries, tho' they wrought him much Mischief. He built and endowed many Religious Foundations, besides his Memorable Hospital of the Savoy. And yet was he a great Alms-giver in secret; which shewed, that his Works in Publick were Dedicated rather to God's Glory, than his own. He profess'd always to love and seek Peace; and it was his usual Preface in his Treaties; That when Christ came into the World, Peace was sung; and when he went out of the World, Peace was bequeath'd. And this Vertue could not proceed out of Fear, or Softness; for he was Valiant and Active and therefore (no doubt) it was truly Christian and Moral. Yet he knew the way to Peace, was not to seem to be desirous to avoid Wars. Therefore would he make Offers, and Fames of Wars, till he had mended the Conditions of Peace. It was also much, that one that was so great a Lover of Peace, should be so happy in War. For his Arms (either in Foreign or Civil Wars) were never Infortunate; neither did he know what a Disaster meant. The War of his Coming in, and the Rebellions of the Earl of Lincoln, and the Lord Audley were ended by Victory. The Wars of France and Scotland, by Peaces fought at his Hands. That of Brittain, by Accident of the Duke's Death. The Insurrection of the Lord Lovel, and that of Perkin at Exeter, and in Kent, by flight of the Rebels before they came to Blows. So that his Fortune of Arms was still Inviolable. The rather sure, for that in the quenching of the Commotions of his Subjects, he ever went in Person. Sometimes reserving himself to back and second his Lieutenants, but ever in Action; and yet that was not merely Forwardness, but partly Distrust of others.

" He did much maintain and countenance his Laws. Which (nevertheless) was no Impediment to him to work his Will. For it was so handled, that neither Prerogative, nor † Reckoning from the Day of his Victory of Bosworth, when Sir William Stanley crown'd him in the Field, which was the 22d of August 1485. to the 22d of April 1508. is but 22 Years and 8 Months; whereas he reign'd 23 Years and 8 Months, and dy'd the 22d of April 1509.

1509. " Profit went to Diminution. And yet as he " would sometimes strain up his Laws to his " Prerogative, so would he also let down his " Prerogative to his Parliament. For Mint and " Wars, and Martial Discipline, (things of Ab" solute Power) he would nevertheless bring to " Parliament. Justice was well administred in " his time, save where the King was Party:
 " Save also, that the Council-Table intermeddled
 " too much with Menum and Tuum. For it was " a very Court of Justice during his time, espe" cially in the Beginning. But in that part both " of Justice and Policy, which is the Durable
 " part, and cut (as it were) in Brasse or Marble
 " (which is the making of good Laws) he did " excel. And with his Justice, he was also a " Merciful Prince. As in whose time there were " but three of the Nobility that suffer'd; the " Earl of Warwick, the Lord Chamberlain, and
 " the Lord Audley. Though the first two were " instead of Numbers, in the Dislike and Oblo" quy of the People. But there were never so " great Rebellions expiated with so little Blood,
 " drawn by the hand of Justice, as the two Re" bellions of Black-Heath and Exeter. As for " the Severity used upon those which were taken
 " in Kent, it was but upon a Scum of People.
 " His Pardons went ever both before and after " his Sword. But then he had withal a strange
 " kind of interchanging of large and unexpected
 " Pardons, with severe Executions. Which " (his Wisdom consider'd) could not be imput-
 " ed to any Inconstancy, or Inequality; but " either to some Reason which we do not now
 " know, or to a Principle he had set unto him" self, That he would vary, and try both ways in " turn. But the less Blood he drew, the more
 " he took of Treasure. And (as some constru'd
 " it) he was the more sparing in the one, that
 " he might be the more pressing in the other;
 " for both would have been intollerable. Of " Nature assuredly he coveted to accumulate
 " Treasure, and was a little Poor in admiring " Riches. The People (into whom there is in" fused, for the Preservation of Monarchies, a " natural Desire to discharge their Princes, tho'
 " it be with the unjust Charge of their Coun-" cellors and Ministers) did impute this unto " Cardinal Morton, and Sir Reginald Bray. Who
 " (as it after appear'd) as Counsellors of ancient " Authority with him, did so second his Hu" mours, as nevertheless they did temper them.
 " Whereas Empson and Dudley that follow'd, be" ing Persons that had no Reputation with him
 " (otherwise than by the servile following of his " Bent) did not give way only (as the first did)
 " but shape him way to those Extremities, for " which himself was touch'd with Remorse at " his Death, and which his Successor renounc'd, " and sought to purge. This Excess of his, had
 " at that time many Glosses and Interpretations.
 " Some thought the continual Rebellions where-
 " with he had been vexed, had made him grow
 " to hate his People. Some thought it was done
 " to pull down their Stomachs, and to keep them
 " low. Some, for that he would leave his Son
 " a Golden-Fleece. Some suspected he had some " high Design upon Foreign Parts. But those " perhaps shall come nearest the Truth, that " fetch not their Reasons so far off; but rather
 " impute it to Nature, Age, Peace, and a Mind
 " fixed upon no other Ambition or Pursuit.
 " Whereunto I should add, that having every " day Occasion to take notice of the Necessities
 " and Shifts for Money of other great Princes
 " abroad, it did the better (by Comparifon) set " off to him the Felicity of full Coffers. As to 1509. " his expending of Treasure, he never spar'd " Charge which his Affairs required; and in his " Buildings was Magnificent, but his Rewards

 " were very limited. So that his Liberality
 " was rather upon his own State and Memory,
 " than upon the Deserts of others.
 " He was of an high Mind, and lov'd his " own Will, and his own Way; as one that re" vered himself, and would Reign indeed. Had
 " he been a Private Man, he would have been " termed Proud. But in a wise Prince, it was " but keeping of Distance, which indeed he did " towards all; not admitting any near or full " Approach, neither to his Power or to his Se" crets. For he was govern'd by none. His Queen
 " (notwithstanding she had presented him with
 " divers Children, and with a Crown also, tho'
 " he would not acknowledge it) could do no" thing with him. His Mother he revered
 " much, heard little. For any Person agreeable " to him for Society (such as was Hastings to K.
 " Edward IV. or Charles Brandon after to K. Hen- " ry VIII.) he had none: Except we should ac" count for such Persons, Fox, and Bray, and
 " Empson; because they were so much with him:
 " But it was but as the Instrument is much with
 " the Workman. He had nothing in him of " Vain-glory, but yet kept State and Majesty
 " to the height; Being sensible, That Majesty
 " maketh the People bow, but Vain-glory bow-
 " eth to them.
 " To his Confederates abroad he was Con" stant and Just, but not Open. But rather such " was his Inquiry, and such his Closeness, as " they stood in the Light towards him, and he " stood in the Dark to them. Yet without " Strangeness, but with a semblance of mutual " Communication of Affairs. As for little En" vies, or Emulations upon Foreign Princes (which " are frequent with many Kings) he had never
 " any; but went substantially to his own Bu" siness. Certain it is, that though his Reputa" tion was great at Home, yet it was greater " Abroad. For Foreigners that could not see
 " the Passages of Affairs, but made their Judg" ments upon the Issues of them, noted that he " was ever in Strife, and ever a Loft. It grew
 " also from the Airs which the Princes and " States abroad receiv'd from their Ambassadors
 " and Agents here; which were Attending the " Court in great Number. Whom he did not " only content with Courtesy, Reward, and " Privateness; but (upon such Conferences as " pass'd with them) put them in Admiration,
 " to find his Universal Insight into the Affairs
 " of the World. Which tho' he did suck chiefly " from themselves; yet that which he had ga" thered from them all, seem'd Admirable to " every one. So that they did write ever to " their Superiors in high terms, concerning his " Wisdom and Art of Rule, nay, when they " were return'd, they did commonly maintain " Intelligence with him. Such a Dexterity he " had to impropiate to himself all Foreign In" struments.
 " He was careful and liberal to obtain good " Intelligence from all Parts abroad. Wherein
 " he did not only use his Interest in the Lie-
 " gers here, and his Pensioners which he had " both in the Court of Rome, and other the " Courts of Christendom; but the Industry and " Vigilancy of his own Ambassadors in Foreign " Parts. For which purpose, his Instructions
 " were ever Extream, Curious, and Articulate;
 " and in them more Articles touching Inquisi" tion, than touching Negotiation. Requiring

"As for his secret Spialls, which he did employ both at Home and Abroad, by them to discover what Practices and Conspiracies were against him, surely his Case required it: He had such Moles perpetually working and casting to Undermine him. Neither can it be reprehended, For if Spialls be lawful against lawful Enemies, much more against Conspirators and Traytors. But indeed to give them Credence by Oaths or Curses, that cannot be well maintained; for those are too holy Vestments for a Disguise. Yet surely there was this further Good in his employing of these Flies and Familiars; That as the Use of them was Cause that many Conspiracies were revealed, so the Fame and Suspicion of them kept (no doubt) many Conspiracies from being attempted.

"Towards his Queen he was nothing Uxorious, nor scarce Indulgent; but Companionable and Respective, and without Jealousy.

His Affection to his Wife and Children. "Towards his Children † he was full of Paternal Affection, Careful of their Education, aspiring to their High Advancement, regular to see that they should not want of any due Honour and Respect, but not greatly willing to cast any popular Lustre upon them.

His Industry in Affairs of State. "To his Council he did refer much, and oft in Person; knowing it to be the Way to assist his Power, and inform his Judgment. In which respect also he was fairly patient of Liberty, both of Advice, and of Vote, till himself were declar'd. He kept a strait hand on his Nobility, and chose rather to advance

Neither did he care how Cunning they were, that he did employ; for he thought himself to have the Master-Reach: And as he chose well, so he held them up well. For it is a strange thing, that tho' he were a Dark Prince, and infinitely Suspicious, and his Times full of Secret Conspiracies and Troubles; yet in Twenty four

No Counsellor or Servant but the Ld Chamberlain displaced in this Reign. In what terms he was with his Subjects as to love, Fear and Reverence. "Years Reign, he never put down, or displaced Counsellor, or near Servant, save only Stanley, the Lord Chamberlain. As for the Disposition of his Subjects in general towards him, it stood thus with him; That of the Three Affections, which naturally tie the Hearts of the Subjects to their Sovereigns; Love, Fear, and Reverence; he had the last in height, the second in good measure, and so little of the first, as he was beholding to ther two.

"He was a Prince Sad, Serious and full of Thoughts and secret Observations, and full of Notes and Memorials of his own Hand, especially touching Persons. As whom to Employ, whom to Reward, whom to Enquire of, whom to Beware of, what were the Dependencies, what were the Factions, and the like; keeping (as it were) a Journal of his Thoughts.

"There is to this day a merry Tale; That his Monkey (set on as it was thought by one of his Chamber) tore his Principal Note-Book all to pieces, when by chance it lay forth.

"Whereat the Court (which liked not those Pen-sive Accompts) was almost tickled with Sport.

"He was indeed full of Apprehensions and Suspicions. But as he did easily take them, so he did easily check them, and master them: whereby they were not dangerous, but troubled himself more than others. It is true, his "Thoughts were so many, as they could not well always stand together; but that which did good one way, did hurt another. Neither did he at some times weigh them aright

"in their Proportions. Certainly, that Rumour which did him so much Mischief (That the Duke of York should be saved, and alive) was (at the "first) of his own nourishing; because he would have more Reason not to Reign in the right

"of his Wife. He was affable, and both well and Fair-spoken; and would use strange

"Sweetness and Blandishments of Words, where he desired to effect or persuade any "thing that he took to Heart. He was rather Studious than Learned; reading most Books "that were of any worth, in the French Tongue. Yet he understood the Latin, as appeareth in "that Cardinal Hadrian, and others, who could very well have written French, did use to write "to him in Latin.

"For his Pleasures, there is no News of them.

"And yet by his Instructions to Marlin and Stile touching the Queen of Naples, it seemeth he could Interrogate well touching Beauty. He "did by Pleasures, as great Princes do by Banquets, come and look a little upon them, and

"turn away. For never Prince was more wholly given to his Affairs, nor in them more "of himself. In so much, as in Triumphs of Justs, and Tournays, and Balls, and Masks

"(which they then called Disguises) he was rather a Princely and Gentle Spectator, than

"seemed much to be delighted.

"No doubt, in him as in all Men (and most of all in Kings) his Fortune wrought upon "his Nature, and his Nature upon his Fortune. He attained to the Crown, not only from a "private Fortune, which might indow him with Moderation; but also from the Fortune of an

"Exiled Man, which had quickened in him all Seeds of Observation and Industry. And his

"Times being rather Prosperous, than Calm, had raised his Confidence by Success, but almost

"marred his Nature by Troubles. His Wisdom, by often evading from Perils, was "turned rather into a Dexterity to deliver himself from Dangers, when they press'd him, than

"into a Providence to prevent and remove them a far off. And even in Nature, the Sight of his "Mind was like some Sights of Eyes; rather strong at Hand, than to carry a far off. For his Wit

"increased upon the Occasion; and so much the

† He had by his Queen, Elizabeth Daughter to Edward the Fourth, four Sons and four Daughters, Arthur who died five Months after his Marriage to the Princess Katherine of Spain. Henry who married his Brother's Widdow, and Succeeded his Father, by the Name of Henry the Eighth, Edmund and another Son, who died young; Margaret Queen of the Scots, and Mary, who married the French King Lewis the 12th, and afterwards Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk. The other two Daughters died in their Childhood.

1509. "more if the Occasion were sharpened by Danger. Again, whether it were the Shortness of his Foresight, or the Strength of his Will, or the Dazling of his Suspicions, or what it was; certain it is, that the perpetual Troubles of his Fortunes (there being no more Matter out of which they grew) could not have been without some great Defects, and main Errors in his Nature, Customs, and Proceedings, which he had enough to do to save and help, with a thousand little Industries and Watches. But those do best appear in the Story it self. Yet take him with all his Defects, if a Man should compare him with the Kings his Concurrents, in France and Spain, he shall find him more Politick than Lewis the Twelfth of France, and more entire and Sincere than Ferdinando of Spain. But if you shall change Lewis the Twelfth, for Lewis the Eleventh, who lived a little before; then the Consort is more perfect. For that Lewis the Eleventh, Ferdinando, and Henry, may be esteemed for the Tres Magi of Kings of those Ages. To conclude, If this King did no greater Matters, it was long of himself; for what he minded, he compassed.

A Comparison of him with other Princes.

His Person.

"He was a Comely Personage, a little above just Stature, well and straight Limmed, but slender. His Countenance was Reverend, and a little like a Church-Man: And as it was not strange or dark, so neither was it Winning or Pleasing, but as the Face of one well disposed. But it was to the Disadvantage of the Painter; for it was best when he spake.

"His Worth may bear a Tale or two, that may put upon him somewhat that may seem Divine. When the Lady Margaret his Mother had diverse great Sutors for Marriage, she dreamed one Night, That one in the likeness of a Bishop, in Pontifical Habit, did tender her Edmund Earl of Richmond (the Kings Father) for her Husband. Neither had she ever any Child but the King, though she had three Husbonds. One day when King Henry the Sixth (whose Innocency gave him Holiness) was washing his Hands at a great Feast, and cast his Eye upon King Henry, then a young Youth, he said; This is the Lad, that shall possess quietly that, that we now strive for. But that that was truly Divine in him, was, that he had the Fortune of a True Christian, as well as of a Great King, in living Exercised, and dying Repentant. So as he had an happy Warfare in both Conflicts, both of Sin, and the Cross.

"He was born at Pembroke Castle and lyeth buried at Westminster, in one of the Stateliest and Daintiest Monuments of Europe, both for the Chappel, and for the Sepulcher. So that he dwelleth more richly Dead, in the Monument of his Tomb, than he did alive in Richmond, or any of his Palaces. I could wish he did the like, in this Monument of his Fame.

IN his second Year, John Percival, the Lord Mayor's Carver, was chosen one of the Sheriffs of London in this manner: Sir Henry Collet the Lord Mayor, took a Cup of Wine, and Drank to John Percival, who waited then at his Table standing bare; the Lord Mayor drinking to him and Stiling him Sheriff of London for the ensuing Year, so far made use of his Privilege of Election that way, as to cause Percival to put on his Hat, and sit down at the Table; accordingly the Carver sat down, took on him the Office of Sheriff, and was afterwards Lord Mayor himself, and Knighted.

In his seventh Year, Robert Fabian was Alderman and Sheriff of London. He wrote a History of England and France, from the Creation of the World to the third Year of the Reign of King Henry the 8th.

In his ninth Year, on the 28th of April, Joan Boughton a Widow was Burnt in Smithfield for Heresie and professing Wickliff's Opinions. In this Year Wheat was sold in London for four Shillings a Quarter, and Bordeaux Wine or Claret, for thirty Shillings a Hogshead.

In the tenth Year of his Reign, the Body of one Alice Hackney, which had been bury'd 175 Years, ever since the beginning of the Reign of Edward the 2d, was accidentally dug up in the Church of St. Mary Hill, London: The Skin of the Corps was whole, and the Joynts of the Arms pliable.

In his fifteenth Year, a Pestilence rag'd in England, which swept away no less than 30000 Men, Women and Children in one Year in the City of London.

In the seventeenth Year of his Reign, Sir John Shaw, then Lord Mayor, first caus'd his Brethren the Aldermen to ride to the Water side when he went to the Exchequer-Bar by Water to be Sworn. He was also the first that had the Mayor's Feast in Guild Hall, which was before done at Grocer's or Merchant Taylor's Hall. Also this Year Sebastian Cabot brought three Indians into England. They were Cloath'd in Beasts Skins, and eat raw Flesh. Two of them were seen two Years after dress'd like English Men, and not to be distinguish'd from them.

In the Year following, on the 18th Day of January, the first Stone of the Chappel known by the Name of Henry the Seventh's Chappel, was laid within the Monastery of Westminster by John Islip the Abbot, Sir Reginald Bray Knight of the Garter, Dr. Barnes Master of the Rolls, Sir Edward Stanhope, and others, assisting at the Ceremonies. The Charges of this Building amounted to no more than fourteen Thousand Pound, if we may believe our Author.

In the 22d Year of his Reign, the Sweating Sicknefs which happen'd in his first Year return'd; but the Cure being known, it was not so mortal as the First was.

Besides the famous Captains mention'd by the Noble Author of this Reign, in his discoursing of King Henry VII. he had other Officers of great Valour and Conduct, as

George Earl of Shrewsbury, George Lord Strange, Edward Lord Woodville, Sir Rice ap Thomas, the Lord Morley, and Sir John Cheyne. Those that we name hereafter were Men of Courage and Experience; but being Enemies to the House of Lancaster, and taking hold of all Opportunities to disturb King Henry's Government, they Perished all of them as Traytors.

John de la Pool Earl of Lincoln, James Touchet, Lord Audley, the Lord Lovel, Sir Humphry Stafford, Sir Thomas Broughton, Sir John Egremont, and Sir Simon Monfort.

The Writers in King Henry VII. time, were

George Ripley a Carmelite Fryer of Boston.

He wrote several Mathematical Treatises; and was after his Death reckon'd a Conjuror by the Populace.

Dr. John Ergham a black Fryer born in York, Professor of Divinity at Oxford: He was fond of Prophecies.

John Percival a Carthusian Monk.

Thomas Maitorie a Welshman. He wrote of King Arthur and the Knights of the Round Table.

Thomas Scroop of the Noble Family of the Scroops: He affected to Preach in Sack-cloath and bare-Foot. He was sometimes a Benedictine, sometimes a Dominican, and sometimes a Carmelite Fryer. He was at last made a Bishop in Ireland, and liv'd to be near a Hundred Years Old. The latter part of his Life he spent like an Anchorite.

John Tonneis an Augustine Fryer, wrote a Grammar, which was Printed by Richard

Geffery, Sirnamed the Grammarians.

John Alcock Bishop of Ely, Founder of Jesus Colledge in Cambridge. It was formerly a Nunnery, but the Abbess and the Nuns were turned out for their dissolute Lives.

Stephen Haws, Esquire, one of the Gentlemen of the King's Privy Chamber.

William of Bintree in Norfolk, a Carmelite Fryer of Burnham, and a great Divine.

William Gallion of Lyn, Provincial of the Augustine Fryers.

William Celling of Feversham, a Monk of Canterbury.

Cardinal Thomas Bouchier of the Noble Family of the Bouchiers, Earls of Essex: He was first Bishop of Ely, then Archbishop of Canterbury. He was advanced to the Purple by Pope Paul II.

Philip Bromierd, a Dominican Fryer a Divine.

Dr. John Miles, L. L. D. of Brazen Colledge in Oxford; which Colledge was Founded in this Reign by William Smith Bishop of London.

Robert Viduus Vicar of Thaxstead in Essex, Canon of Wells: An excellent Poet says Hol.

Dr. Kenighal.

Cardinal Morton, of whom mention is frequently made in this History.

Henry Midwel, his Chaplain.

Edmund Dudley, Esquire, a Lawyer, once Speaker of the House of Commons. He was a main Instrument of King Henry's Exactions. He wrote a Book Intituled Arbor Rei Publicæ.

John Buckinham, an excellent Schoolman.

Dr. William Blackneie, a Carmelite Fryer, a Doctor of Divinity, and a Necromancer.

Bernardus Andreas, who called himself Poet Laureat, and Historiographer Royal. He wrote the Life of King Henry VII.
